SUPERNATURAL phenomena have marked the close and opening of each dispensation in the past. What has been may be, and the signs are thick upon us that such forces are again in our midst. Mark the lesson; these show that the sands of time, as regards the present dispensation, are well nigh run out. Spiritualism has proved beyond reasonable doubt that it possesses a force and knowledge which is neither earthly nor human. Millions of persons, many of them hard-headed and sceptical men of science, are disciples thereof. It is neither reasonable nor wise to disregard this warning fulfilment of 1 Tim. iv. 1, and Rev. xvi. 14. In America, its centre being in Boston, a sect of "Christian Scientists" has been formed, who profess and practise healing by the "mind-cure." The healer and the patient sit opposite to each other, thinking intensely on the desired cure, until the combined mental power produces what is termed "a chemical change in the fluids of the system that results in health." The Salvation Army has in its ranks members who profess and practise the gift of faith (or miraculous) healing. At St. Mary's Hall, London, N., June 1st to 5th, an "International Faith-Healing Conference" was held; morning, afternoon, and evening. Remarkable testimonies as to personal cures were borne, and on one day alone between forty and fifty persons professed to have been cured at the meetings.—Glad Tidings of the Coming Age, September, 1885.

A Plea.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Now that Science has turned her gaze upon things psychical, so long left by her unexamined, and has deigned to regard them if only through a reversed telescope, it may be not unfitting to utter a special word of protest.

The investigation ought not to be accompanied by vivisection of the conscious subject.

It is one which, being undertaken, pre-eminently requires to be conducted with humanity.

The victims, when there are any, our weaker brethren, should not have their very seats of sensitiveness cut down upon by the knife of the critic; and their cerebral, moral, or intellectual insufficiency painfully revealed to themselves and to the world. The operation should be conducted privately under chloroform. The victim should be made aware of what has happened as little as possible. He should be treated as the subject of a lithotomy once was, whose feelings of property and of vanity were equally gratified by the present of a pretty glass marble; while the extracted phosphatic debris, perhaps representative of brain waste, was finally thrown away, and only referred to in dry analytical tables.

A properly educated Spiritualist or Occultist, of course, can front every investigation with fearless confidence. It is amusing enough to witness an encounter between the precluded scepticist and a Spiritualist of the first water. Vain is it to try to cut a diamond with steel, to pierce mail-proof with a barber's pole. I am thinking of that Recoil of the Broomstick. How infinitely just and amusing that was!

But if there are retailers of experiences who are palpably deceived (and I confess to have occasionally met such, though not among the properly educated), and if there is here and there, quite possibly, a medium (all mediums are not Eglintons) who may mingle fraud with his manifestations, it is sufficient for Science generally to bear in mind these negative discoveries, and allow them to have their due influence in her understanding and exposition of the positive. It is not necessary for her to descend from her estate, high above temporalities, to smite or to slay any of the erring fugitive race of mortals.

At least this is the fugitive opinion of, sir, your obedient servant,

"A Few Words on Spiritualism," from "Lily."

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I have been reading with deep interest the admirable letter in your issue of the 12th inst., by the author of "Scientific Materialism," entitled "Relations between Spiritualism and Science," and as one whose experience of Spiritualism (for eleven years) has been in the strictest privacy of private life, perhaps you may consider a few words from me on this subject not irrelevant.

I have always studiously read and pondered over whatever has come in my way—scientific or otherwise—on the "Why and the Wherefore" of Spiritual phenomena, every phase of which, except the paraffin moulding, I have witnessed over and over again, and almost always in the privacy of my own or a dear friend's apartments.

But none of the manifold arguments or would-be explanations I have read, have ever moved me from the simple, common-sense explanation of the phenomena that I formed after due investigation (and which time and experience have only served to strengthen to the uttermost), viz., that they are the work of human beings, every bit as human as we are ourselves—like ourselves, men, women, and children—the only difference being that they are freed from the outer garment of flesh, which we still wear, and which renders us visible to the eye of flesh, as they were, so long as they wore it, and which they still are, when circumstances allow of their resuming it temporarily for our instruction.

Why will men surround God's choicest gifts—as religion and Spiritualism are—with difficulties, and dogmas, and mysticisms, that do not belong to them, and that only deaden and drown their grand and simple beauty and purity?

For the grandest truths are always the clearest and simplest, and most emphatically prove themselves to be such, to all who will watch their workings with reasoning and patient earnestness.

As the whole of religion is comprised in those few sublime yet simple words, "Love God with all your heart and soul, and your neighbour as yourself," so is the whole sublime truth of Spiritualism comprised in equally few and simple words, "God's love to us, in sending His messengers (our fellow men) once more to earth, to teach and raise us spiritually, by a close and personal intercourse with us."

Fearing to trespass too much on your valuable space, I have confined myself to the barest outline of this most gracious ordinance of the Father, for the uplifting of His benighted children; for were I to attempt to illustrate it by my experiences, a large volume would not suffice.

I will, therefore, only say, as the result of these manifold experiences, that if the Spiritual Beings who now come to us are not men, women, and children, neither are we; for they are counterparts of us in all the essential characteristics of our humanity; and if those who elaborate such abstruse and far-fetched arguments in their endeavours to prove the contrary, would only seek for themselves the same experiences I have had for many years past (and which all may do) they must most inevitably come to the same conclusion.

Trusting to your kindness to allow this letter to appear in your columns,—I beg to remain, sir, faithfully yours,

September 15th, 1885.

"LILY."

The "Electric" Girl at the Albert Palace.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—In your issue for August 15th there appeared a letter asking for an explanation of the above phenomenon, and, at the same time, indicating that the writer had indeed placed faith in the statement of the wily showman.

About this particular "Electric Girl" I have no information, but a knowledge of the modus operandi used in the production of other electric boys and girls, together with one clause in your correspondent's letter, leads me to believe that this girl is as great an imposition as the rest.

The visitor is placed on one side of a low barricade, on the other side of which are the showman and the girl in question. The floor in front of this barricade is, in some cases, covered with sheet lead or copper, in others with matting saturated with salt and water or dilute acid, and a similar covering of lead, copper, or moistened matting is laid behind, under the feet, usually bare, of the electric girl. These two pieces of matting are connected with the secondary coil of an induction machine (commonly known as a galvanic battery), which is situated so far off that the noise of its vibration is not perceptible.

On shaking hands, or in any other way making contact with the girl, the circuit is completed through the boots, body, and arms of the visitor, to the arms and body of the girl, and so to the floor. The current, which, owing to physiological formation, is only felt in the hands and arms when passing through the body, would not pass at all if the spectator wore goloshes or water-tight rubber boots, which was probably the case with the gentleman mentioned by your correspondent. This fact is taken advantage of by the exhibitor to still further strengthen his statements.

He frequently wears on one foot an ordinary boot, and on the other a rubber sole or covering; to show, as he says, that the electricity is not coming up from the floor, he lifts the girl off her feet, and the shock is still felt. Should the visitor hint that the current is still passing through him, the 'cute' exhibitor lays down the girl, extends his hand, and the astonished investigator feels nothing.

"There is no deception, ladies and gentlemen,"—(aside)—"but you didn't see me stand on my insulated leg when I shook hands with you." The whole show is very amusing and interesting, and, if the showman would only stick to the truth, would be quite as lucrative and more harmless. But the gravest part is yet to come.

I have seen, day after day, week after week, a little negro boy, barely seven years of age, compelled to sit, practically naked, exposed to cold and draughts, continually pinched, squeezed, and tortured, by ignorant people (I suppose to see if he was alive), and ever and anon subject to the passage of currents of electricity, from which his poor little body seemed to shrink, and from which the thoughtless spectators did shrink. Such a method, I say, of foisting electric boys and girls on the public, is not only a barefaced, impudent swindle, but an infernal crime.—Yours in the cause of truth,

Edinburgh.

SPIRITUALISM IN ACCORD WITH TRUE SCIENCE.

Spiritualism is not antagonistic to true science, but simply to the opinions and prejudices of those who from their labours in particular fields of scientific research, have attained recognised positions as scientific men, to which they are no doubt entitled. But a truly scientific man has no prejudice; he is a philosopher, and never determines for or against a thing until he has tested it thoroughly, observing and comparing its manifestations by his highest reason, and testing his own observations, when practicable, by the experiments of others in the same field. This we know by experience that the scientific men of the day do not do. Because psychical phenomena enter occasionally into the domain of physics and produce effects which their previous experience leads them to assume are the necessary result of physical causes, they take up an antagonistic position, deciding upon a priori grounds that the asserted causes of the phenomena are fictitious, and that consequently those who make the assertion are either frauds or fools.

There might be some excuse for them in the early years of Modern Spiritualism, when but few of their own class had turned their attention to the phenomena, and the records of experiment were fragmentary and defective, but in the present day, after the recorded experiments of a long chain of eminent men of recognised scientific ability, extending over three decades, commencing with the great American chemist, Professor Robert Hare, and ending at the present with the well-known German astronomer, Friedrich Zöllner, their position is particularly unphilosophical, and nothing but the fact of popular prejudices being in harmony with their own, saves them from appearing ridiculous in the eyes of the community.

Sir David Brewster, when certain phenomenal facts were forced upon him, said he would give in to "anything but Spiritualism" as a means of accounting for them. And so it is with the majority of our pseudo-scientists of the present day; they have committed themselves by denying in toto the spiritual origin of the phenomena, and are too proud to retreat from their position by the straight road, so find some tortuous side line to get out of it; hence we have the phenomena of thought-reading and clairvoyance accepted by them under the name of Telepathy, and mesmeric-healing accepted by the doctors under the title of "Massage"! We have never seen the position of Spiritualism with regard to science more tersely put than in the following extract from a recent article by Mr. Alfred Russel Wallace:—

"Now Modern Spiritualism rests solely on the observation and comparison of facts in a domain of nature which has been hitherto little explored, and it is a contradiction in terms to say that such an investigation is opposed to science. Equally absurd is the allegation that some of the phenomena of Spiritualism 'contradict the laws of nature,' since there is no law of nature yet known to us but may be apparently contravened by the action of more recondite laws or forces. Spiritualists observe facts and record experiments, and then construct hypotheses which will best explain and co-ordinate the facts, and in so doing they are pursuing a truly scientific course."—Slightly abridged from "Harbinger of Light."

DR. E. VON HARTMANN ON "SPIRITISM."

The translation of this pamphlet, which is now appearing in our columns, will be completed in the issue of "LIGHT" for October 10th. We shall then be prepared to receive letters discussing and criticising Dr. Hartmann's views. Without in any way seeking to anticipate the lines of argument likely to be advanced in sustaining or refuting the position taken by the author of "The Philosophy of the Unconscious" with regard to the phenomena and theories of Spiritualism, it is at least open to us to point out that there are many facts, if not of common, of frequent occurrence, which will have a direct bearing on any reply Spiritualists and others may make. Additional interest is lent to the publication of this work for English readers by the fact that Dr. Hartmann's theory has a direct bearing on the "telepathic" and "unconscious secondary self" theories recently put forward by the Society for Psychical Research.

As it will be a clear advantage to have the case presented in a compact and handy form for reference, a small edition of the pamphlet will be issued immediately (on or about October 14th) after the completion of the translation in "LIGHT." Between forty and fifty copies have already been ordered, and those who wish to possess the work in book form will please not delay in making known their wish. The price will be three shillings, and we are now open to receive orders for 200 copies.

MR. W. EGLINTON has, we hear, been obtaining very successful results at his sances since his return to town.

THE Rev. J. Ware, who has done excellent work in the provinces for Spiritualism, has removed to the Metropolis, and is now connected with the College Unitarian Chapel, at Stepney Green.

MRS. C. L. V. RICHMOND has been meeting with great success at Newcastle-on-Tyne, where she has lectured to large audiences.

MR. W. J. COLVILLE will lecture in the Psychological Hall, Leeds, on September 29th, this being his last meeting in England prior to his departure for America.

BARON LANGSDORFF, of Freiburg, Baden, is an excellent medium, and receives communications of a prophetic character, many of which he has been able to verify.

A LADY in Bournemouth would like to make the acquaintance of some Spiritualists in that town. Letters may be addressed to Mrs. W., 36, Northcote-road, Bournemouth.

WE much regret to have to record the passing away, in her seventy-fifth year, of Mrs. Elizabeth Lewis. The deceased lady was the wife of the President of the Cardiff Spiritual Society, Mr. Rees Lewis, and was much esteemed by all who knew her. The interment took place on the 12th, an appropriate selection being read from Mr. J. S. Farmer's "New Basis."

ALDERMAN T. P. BARKAS, F.G.S., will lecture on Sunday, September 27th, at seven p.m., in the Waterloo Rooms, 43, Waterloo-street, corner of Wellington-street, Glasgow. Subject: "Personal Investigation into the Phenomena alleged to be Spiritual." Questions invited from students of science at the close of the lecture.

La Vie Posthume is a new monthly, published at Marseilles. It proposes to occupy itself with all questions relating to Spiritual science. It defines Spiritism and Spiritualism as "neither a school nor a church: it is a truth for enlightening and solving hitherto unsolved social and moral problems."—Le Rots (The Rock), Ostend.

RECORDS OF PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

[In this column will be given from time to time such accounts of psychical phenomena as seem to be worthy of permanent record. Beyond the general classification indicated, no attempt at tabulation will at present be made; that work will follow in due course. In furtherance of this object we shall be pleased to receive from our readers brief reports of phenomena subject to two conditions. (1) That a colourless statement of facts without comment is given; and (2) that communications are accompanied by the names and addresses of those concerned, not necessarily for publication, though we should naturally prefer to be at liberty to publish them. Amongst the phenomena referred to may be mentioned:—

- | | |

CLASS M.—KNOCKINGS: HORS DE SEANCE.

Upon the evening of September 10th, 1885, Mr. and Mrs. Farmer, Mr. Eglinton, together with Messrs. Leonard, Cassal, and Downing were seated engaged in conversation, when knockings made themselves heard, sometimes apparently under the table, and sometimes upon the walls of the room, upon the doors, furniture, and on the floor, not under the table. Mr. Downing, who was seated opposite to Mr. Eglinton, can speak to hearing them apparently under his chair, and to feeling a certain accompanying vibration. The knockings, which in sound were of a dull thudding character, and varied in their quickness of succession, gradually forced themselves upon the attention of all. Without preparation of any kind, the light not being turned down, nor hands joined, questions were put to the invisible presence, and it was found that the sounds had special reference to Mr. Farmer, but that the nature of the communication to be made was not to be revealed until the next evening. Mr. Farmer was shortly after seized with a strong impression as to what would then occur, and having written this impression down he enclosed the paper in an envelope, which was immediately sealed and given into the custody of Mr. Leonard, signed upon the outside by every person present.* In spite of the fact that the communication was only to be made the next evening, the knockings continued, and answers were given to some unimportant questions, as well as in number as requested. It may here be mentioned that as soon as the questioning began, nearly all present were more or less strongly influenced, and the party was adjudged by the presence itself to be exceptionally mediumistic in its constitution.

An experiment was now tried. A square piece of paper was held at the four corners by Messrs. E., C., L., and D. above the centre of the table, in full light. Under these circumstances tiny raps, such as might be made by the head of a pin dotted against the paper, were heard by Messrs. E., L., and C., apparently proceeding from its surface. Next a match was thrust through one corner, the match held in the fingers of Mr. E., and the paper thus suspended in full light over the centre of the table. The same tiny raps were this time heard by Messrs. E., L., C., and D. In each of these experiments the raps were given in number as requested. Upon the paper being afterwards held by Mr. D. in the same manner, he having Mr. Eglinton's hand, no result followed.

Some glasses having been brought in, by way of another experiment Mr. E. stood upon these, and in this, his insulated condition, the dull, thudding knockings still continued. He next stood upon a soft cushion doubled over on the hands.

* A special communication was made to Mr. Farmer on the following evening. This did not refer to the impression here spoken of. It was intimated, however, that the communication was incomplete, and would be renewed on another occasion.—Ed.

placed on the floor, of Messrs. L., C., and D. successively. Knockings were heard, apparently from the floor, directly beneath him. To Mr. C. these were accompanied by a vibration felt as proceeding from the floor beneath his hands. To Messrs. L. and D. the accompanying vibration seemed rather to come from above, as if through the compressed cushion. Mr. L. further states that at the moment of the sound a tremor was felt by him, in his own hands, subjective in character, and soon by him in the feet of Mr. E. The tremor was not felt by Mr. E., but was considered by him to be of interest, and to be worth recording. Mr. D. perceived a tremor in Mr. E.'s feet only, not in his own hands. Mr. C. perceived neither. The experiment was varied by Mr. E. placing his hands beneath the cushion, and Mr. C. standing upon it. The sounds, upon this occasion, were not so loud and higher. In all these cases the raps given were in number as requested. Finally Mr. D. placed, not his feet, but his hands upon the top of the cushion, and requested raps to be given in number not as asked aloud, but as thought of by him. In two cases out of four the answer was correct, and Mr. D. was enabled to recognise a very faint vibration upward through the cushion.

It has only to be finally said that this account has been written by one of the party, and has been subjected to the criticism of, and endorsed by, all therein named.

CLASS F.—APPARITIONS.

In John, Lord Campbell's Life of Erskine (born January 10th, 1750, died November 17th, 1823), in his "Lives of the Lord Chancellors of England" (Murray, 1847), appears an account of a supernatural occurrence, which, as part of his own experience, seems to have much impressed the great advocate.

"There being a round of ghost stories in a large company at the old Duchess of Gordon's, when it came to the turn of Erskine, then an ex-Chancellor, he spoke as follows: 'I also believe in "second sight," because I have been its subject. When I was a very young man, I had been for some time absent from home. On the morning of my arrival in Edinburgh, as I was descending the steps of a "close" on coming out from a bookseller's shop, I met our old family butler. He looked greatly changed—pale, wan, and shadowy, as a ghost. "Eh, old boy," I said, "what brings you here?" He replied, "To meet your honour, and solicit your interference with my lord to receive a sum due to me, which the steward, at our last settlement, did not pay." Struck by his look and manner, I bade him follow me to the bookseller's, and into whose shop I stepped back; but when I turned round to him he had vanished.

"I remembered that his wife carried on some little trade in the Old Town; I remembered even the "flat" she occupied, which I had often visited in my boyhood. Having made it out, I found the old woman in widow's mourning. Her husband had been dead for some months, and had told her on his deathbed that my father's steward had wronged him of some money, but that "when Master Tom returned, he would see her righted." This I promised to do, and I shortly after fulfilled my promise. The impression was indelible; and I am extremely cautious how I deny the possibility of such "supernatural" visitings as those which your grace has just instanced in your own family."

J. H. FICHTE, the German philosopher, wrote, when in his 83rd year: "Notwithstanding my age, and my exemption from the controversies of the day, I feel it my duty to bear testimony to the great fact of Spiritualism. No one who knows it should keep silent."

A TYPHOLOGICAL SEANCE.—At a meeting of the Psychological Society of Paris some one spoke of the "Definitions in twelve words" related by Eugène Nus, in his "Things of the Other World," and it was asked if the spirit, who had just been dictating a communication, would help in an experiment of that kind. Assent was given, through the table provided, that the questions could be answered within ten words. A querist then said: "In six words then, what is Socialism?" The table foot was at once moved decidedly at different letters as the alphabet was called, but they seemed to convey no sense. By the same process the direction was given to "read backwards." The answer then read was: "The union of beings in solidarity." Other questions followed; one was "In seven words, what is love?" Answer, in the same inverse order of letters, "Union of souls rather than of bodies." Another, "In three words, what is woman?" Answer, "A charming being." A more gallant answer to the question could not be given in so few words.—La Vie Posthume.

OCCULTISM IN INDIA.

(From "Occult Science in India," by LOUIS JACOLLIST, the Belgian Traveller.)

During my stay in Benares I was the guest of Peishwa, a Mahatta prince, who had a palace, like other rajahs and princes, in the "holy city." While there a religious recipient of Peishwa's hospitality was introduced to me, a Fakir named Covindasamy; he came from Trivanderam, near Cape Comorin, the southernmost point of Hindustan. This Fakir's mission was to bring to Benares the remains of a rich Malabar of the merchant caste.

The apartment in which I received him opened upon a terrace overlooking the sacred River Ganges. In the centre of the terrace, protected from the sun's rays by a thick awning, was a fountain. On this terrace Covindasamy and I sat together; I spoke of the marvels which he was reported to perform, and I ventured to ask him whether he experienced any particular sensation within himself during their performance. He replied that he was only an instrument in their production; that he invoked his pitris, ancestral spirits, and it was they who exhibited their power. I may here say that this was the answer given by every Fakir whom I have questioned on this occult subject.

Covindasamy commenced by extending his hands towards a large bronze vase full of water, into which the fountain played. In five minutes the vase, after gently rocking upon its base, moved towards him in regular alternating motions; as it came nearer I heard sounds emitted from it, as if it were being struck by a steel rod. At my suggestion and request, the vase moved backwards, forwards, or stood still; and the metallic sounds were emitted with slowness or quickness, and with measured exactness as timed by the second hand of my watch. On the table of the room behind was a musical box, so much liked by the Hindus: I had it wound up and started to play by my servant; and I asked the Fakir that the metallic sounds might keep time with the tune, and it was accurately done, whether the time was quick or slow.

The vase in question was so large and heavy that, if empty, it would have required a couple of men to carry; it was one of those used by Hindus for their morning ablutions, and was kept filled for that purpose by the water of the terrace-fountain falling into it. What was the force that moved such a mass? That is the question.

The Fakir, to enable me to be certain, consented to my witnessing a repetition of all the experiments; and they were repeated with exactness. All this time he had been seated, but now he stood up and placed the tips of his fingers on the edge of the vase. It soon began to rock from left to right in regular time, gradually quickening, its base making no sound upon the tessellated floor as it rocked. In all the rockings and movings of the vase I was astonished not to see any spilling of the water it contained; it maintained its level with the rim of the vase; and during the rocking the vase rose seven or eight inches clear off the floor, each time coming down without any shock.

Of all the experiments, repeated for accuracy, as I have said, I took minute notes at the time.

PSYCHOGRAPHY. — At Washington Hall, San Francisco, June 21st, there was a public exhibition of slate-writing, the medium being Mr. Fred Evans. The slates were washed, sealed together by a committee appointed by the audience, and remained in the committee's hands. While under their hands the sounds of writing between them were heard between the slates. On three taps coming, denoting the conclusion of the writing, the committee, in view of the audience, separated the slates, and exhibited them covered with communications, thirty in number, in different handwritings, and in patchwork order. They were addressed to each of the members of the committee and to various persons among the audience, and bore the signatures of departed relatives and friends. The exhibition was in daylight, before an audience of about 400, under conditions precluding trickery of any kind. The committee append their formal verification to the report of the facts as above given. — The Golden Gate.

SPIRITISM.

By EDUARD VON HARTMANN.

Du Prel goes still further, conceiving that thought-reading extends not only to representations actually present in somnambule consciousness, but even to latent memory. (Gedankenlesen, p. 22.) As proof, he adduces the faculty of different individuals (of whom some are "possessed" persons, some Church dignitaries, some ordinary persons, like Zschokke) of seeing perceptibly before them the crises of another's life on first sight of him or hearing his voice. Du Prel here proceeds on the supposition that the actual somnambule consciousness is at the same time the latent memory of the waking consciousness, and has thus only to meet the difficulty, how from the simultaneous medley of all important and unimportant memories in the somnambule consciousness, the more important should be read out in orderly succession.* As I ascribe to the somnambule, as to the waking consciousness, only particular actual representations, and besides, a latent material of memory in molecular predispositions of the parts of the brain supporting the consciousness, I must suppose a clairvoyant transference of molecular brain-predispositions, unless there remains the expedient that the thought-reader, by his unconscious will to perception of character and fate, magnetically constrains the somnambule consciousness of the other to recollection of the crises of his life, and perceives them thus actualised in memory.† This view is, in my opinion, always preferable, that the seer is excited by the rapport of sense established with the other person, clairvoyantly to restore out of himself the events of that person's life, with the scenes of some crisis in it.

The distinction between clairvoyance and thought-reading is that in the latter only present thoughts of waking, dreaming, or somnambule persons are perceived, by a certain resonance of the percipient's own somnambule consciousness, while in the former not only the contents of another consciousness, but real objective phenomena as such are perceived without normal mediation of the instruments of sense.‡ The exclusion of perception by the normal five senses by no means excludes every sort of influence upon sense, but this influence acts neither on sight, hearing, smell, taste, nor touch, but on the sensitive feeling, whose perceptions are then first changed by the somnambule consciousness into representations of sight, or hearing, or thought. Most easily explainable is the sensitive feeling of the personal emanations of men or animals, perception of unobserved cats, designation among several glasses of water of the one in which a finger has been dipped (Ps. St., X., 113, 114, 255-257), because here there need be no change into the perceptual form of one of the five senses, the idea immediately presenting itself. The explanation becomes more difficult when a somnambule, by feeling, correctly names the time shown by a watch set at random and placed in a box, the somnambule applying the object to the side of the head and then believing himself, as it were, to see (III., 532), or when he reads the mottoes enclosed in nuts shortly before bought, and known to none of the party (IV., 299). Still more complicated is the case when the magnetiser places a finger on a chance unknown word in a newspaper, and the word is given by the somnambule.§

* For a full exposition of Du Prel's views, the reader should be referred to his "Philosophie der Mystik," my translation of which is now nearly complete, and will, I hope, before long be published. — Tr.

‡ This distinction between thought-reading and clairvoyance has been already insisted upon by Gregory in his "Letters on Animal Magnetism" (1851), but up to the present has been insufficiently regarded. (Compare Wallace, "The Scientific Aspect of the Supernatural.")

I was trying to devise a means of proving that what she wrote was not due to 'unconscious cerebration.' The planchette, as it always does, insisted that, although it was moved by the hand and arm of the lady, the intelligence was that of an invisible here, to escape true clairvoyance, it has to be supposed that the somnambule consciousness of the magnetiser perceived the word through his finger, and that the somnambule received it by thought-transference. Yet further is the difficulty increased when a medium, by writing at a distance, copies a page, chosen at random, of a closed book laid under the table, although at mediumistic sittings a considerable extension of the medium's sphere of sensitive perception is to be expected.

Nearer again to true clairvoyance are the cases in which the sensitive feeling serves only to establish rapport, to direct the somnambule consciousness to this point or object among an infinite number of possible ones, but not as substitute for sense-perception, i.e., for transmission of the collective mental contents. When, for instance, a somnambule, from the feeling of a lock of hair, defines the particular pains and the character of the disease from which the distant and unknown person is suffering, or by a bit of elephant's tooth which had been found under lava, is excited to visions of troops of elephants and volcanic eruptions, or when a sensitive, disposed to hallucinations, is excited by the drop of coagulated blood lying under the flooring of a bedroom to visions of a suicide or murder, agreeing with the past facts, to him unknown, of this place, or when someone by involuntary writing sets down with substantial, if not verbal, fidelity the three hundred years old poetical dedication of a spinet, afterwards first discovered hidden in the clefts of the latter;* in all these cases clairvoyance is at work. Yet in all these instances the possibility of unconscious sensitive reconstruction of causes from felt effects is still comparatively large; for we do not at all know to what degree of subtlety the traces of past events are stored up in their remains, and can be felt out by a highly sensitive person.

On the other hand, sense-mediation vanishes to an unassignable minimum, when instead of sensitive perception by feeling, an interest of the will takes over the establishment of rapport, e.g., a strong love or friendship, or a mighty patriotism and home sympathy. The seeing at a distance of great natural events in a remote country (fires, earthquakes, war) might still, so far as simultaneous, be referred to thought-reading in the consciousness of persons present at them, and explanation of vision into futurity might be sought in unconscious inference from present circumstances known by thought-reading, since present circumstances contain as well the germ of the future as the deposit of the past. But this interpretation is very difficult with regard to events not within the single course of one train of causes, but arising through unexpected intersection of casual series seemingly lying far apart from each other.†

A corpse-seer, that is to say, one who dreaming or awake foresees cases of death among his acquaintance or at home, may also infer from feelings of serious illness known by thought-reading, that death is at hand, or from dispositions of a person in health known by thought-reading, that there is a tendency to suicide. But why, in that case, does not that which thought-reading immediately apprehends emerge into the waking or dreaming consciousness, why first an inference from that? And why are so often just the unessential details of the death or funeral foreseen? How, from the present contents of another consciousness, is to be got the fact, for instance, that just such a place in being who was playing on her brain as on a musical instrument, and thus moving her muscles. I, therefore, said to this intelligence, 'Can you see the contents of this room?' 'Yes,' wrote the planchette. 'Can you see to read this newspaper?' said I, putting my finger on a copy of the Times, which was on a table behind me, but without looking at it. 'Yes,' was the reply of the planchette. 'Well,' I said, 'if you can see that, write the word which is now covered by my finger, and I will believe you.' The planchette commenced to move. Slowly, and with great difficulty, the word 'however' was written. I turned round, and saw that the word 'however' was covered by the tip of my finger. I had purposely avoided looking at the newspaper when I tried this experiment, and it was impossible for the lady, had she tried, to have seen any of the printed words, for she was sitting on one table and the paper was on another table behind, my body intervening. — Tr.

the city will be chosen for the suicidal shot, or that this particular horse will shy, rear, fling off, and fatally injure the healthy rider? How is to be explained the case of a lady seeing from the window a funeral with well-known mourners drawn through her garden, never used for the passage of funerals, but which yet, some days later, in consequence of a flooding of the road, has to be opened in fact for the passage of the foreseen funeral procession? How can the knowledge of any number of people's thoughts help to prevision, in the place or neighbourhood of their occurrence, of impending fires caused by lightning, or by other events arising accidentally, i.e., out of remote series of causes?

In such cases there seems to be neither mediation by sense nor a possible reduction to thought-reading, and the rapport seems simply conditioned by interest for friends or home. In such cases have we first undoubtedly to do with pure clairvoyance, which always appears in hallucinatory form,* if also frequently with symbolical investment. Just this sort of "second-sight," however, is far more frequent than is supposed, and by confidential inquiry there will be found in a very large percentage of families a corpse-seer or ghost-seer, or the tradition of one. This true clairvoyance can therefore depend neither on thought-reading nor on any sort of sensitive apprehension of ether-vibrations, but must be recognised as a faculty of spiritual overleaping space and time. Thereby is the hallucination, which announces the future to consciousness, evidently only the last result of absolutely unconscious psychical processes, which as such need no sense or material mediation.

Confronted with such facts, either one concedes to the individual soul the faculty of absolute knowledge—that is, of knowledge unlimited by time and space, or one goes behind the individual soul to its essential root in the absolute spirit; in both cases no external and no intermediate assistance is any longer wanted, least of all by spirits of the departed, who also are still only individual souls.

In the first case, the monads or individuals are divided from their absolute ground, from which they yet necessarily must have sprouted, and a property is ascribed to them which only attaches to and besecms the absolute; the other case suggests the inseparable navel-string connecting every creature with its all-mother nature, and the reflection that also in this navel-string spiritual saps must circulate, of which consciousness has only no usual apprehension. If all individuals of higher or lower order are rooted in the Absolute, retrogressively in this they have a second connection among themselves, and there is requisite only a restoration of the rapport or telephonic junction (Telephonanschluss) between two individuals in the Absolute, by an intense interest of the will, to bring about the unconscious spiritual interchange between them without sense-mediation. The hyperesthesia of the parts of the brain supporting the somnambule consciousness makes inspiration from the absolutely unconscious (immaterial) psychical functions of the particular individual soul much easier than does the normal excitability of the parts of the brain supporting waking consciousness. The absolutely unconscious functions of the individual soul are, however, eo ipso again functions of the absolute subject as of one limited, and the strong interest of the will serves for motivation of such unconscious functions, which act inspirationally on the somnambule consciousness.

In the absolute consciousness of the absolute spirit all the threads of causal series are ideally entwined to a single collective intuition, so that from it is predeterminable even what appears accidental in the events of the future. The omniscience of the absolute spirit comprehends implicitly as well the future as the past; therefore, can the individual by means of an intense interest of the will draw unconsciously from the unconscious knowledge of the absolute spirit as well the details of future events as particulars of the present state of the world at distant points. In so far as the absolutely unconscious psychical functions of different individual souls are in the last resort only functions of the same absolute subject with relation to different organisms, from this concrete-monistic standpoint it is intelligible that the strong interest of the individual soul-will suffices to set free, irrespectively of distance, functions in the absolute subject which are directed upon the organism of another individual, and so far seem to be integrating constituents or functions of the individual soul pertaining to that organism. With the exciting or inspiring action upon the somnambulant parts of the brain of the functions thus set free, the transfer of hallucinations* to the somnambulant consciousness of others is prepared.

* There can be hallucinations of hearing as of sight; e.g., prevision of a conflagration may be by hearing of the fire-bells and alarms, or the foreknowledge may clothe itself in the heard words of a phantasm.

This explanation of both clairvoyance and transference of hallucination from far distance seems to me the only possible one, while for thought-transference in immediate proximity I hold Barrett's explanation to be true. According to him, every brain vibration corresponding to a mental representation, produces a sphere of induction-vibrations in the ether, by which similar vibrations are induced in other brains. The first half of the supposition, according to our present physical conceptions, is almost unavoidable, and it can only be doubted whether the induction-sphere is strong enough for perceptible influence upon other brains, and whether the mode of this influence is such as to induce similar representations. The facts that the parts of the brain supporting the waking consciousness are not at all, but the sensitive somnambulant parts of the brain are perceptibly influenced by thoughts of others, that the strength of this influence rapidly diminishes with distance, and is disturbed by light, seem to establish the presumption that the supposed induction-sphere of ether-vibrations is really the reason of the occurrence of a similar complex of vibrations in an adjacent brain.†

The decision is more doubtful in the case of thought-transference from a far distance, Du Prel and Hellenbach here likewise supposing a mediation by ether-vibrations. I believe, on the contrary, that this case comes under the same explanation as clairvoyance. This points to a radical communication between individuals by rapport or telephonic correspondence in the Absolute. I infer this from the fact that in thought-transference at a far distance no difference appears to exist between greater and lesser distances, whereas thought-transference in close proximity diminishes rapidly with remoteness (presumably in proportion to the square of the distance), thus soon reaching a limit where the influence, even with greater intensity of an individual will, ceases. It is true we see light at remote distances, yet only with an organised sense-apparatus adapted to it, and even only then if no untransparent body intervenes; glowing balls of gigantic dimensions appearing as unextended points of faint light. If also gravitation and magnetism act through untransparent bodies, yet with diminution of force in quadratic proportion to distance, very powerful forces and correspondingly large masses are requisite for a considerable effect at remote points. The active force of vibrations, corresponding to an isolated thought, of limited parts of the brain, is quite incommensurately small as against the light and gravitation of the heavenly bodies. If, for example, the somnambulant consciousness were sufficiently sensitive to be affected across the ocean, or more accurately through a great part of the globe, by the induction-spheres of single detached brain-vibrations, on an individual so sensitive would continually stream in such a multitude of thousandfold stronger impressions, that consciousness itself would be overpowered by their mass and relative force, and life would be simply impossible. Therefore, I think that thought-transference at hand and at a distance require quite different principles of explanation, the latter having more affinity to true clairvoyance than to the former.

Accordingly it seems to me impossible to explain thought-transference at a far distance and true clairvoyance by physical mediation, and that recourse to a metaphysical, super-sensuous explanation is unavoidable. But this super-sensuous explanation introduces no new hypothesis, as, for instance, that by spirits does, but rests merely on the rooting (Urstand) of natural individuals in the Absolute: a principle to which only Materialism can object. This explanation transcends, it is true, the mere natural sphere, but only in so far as reaching back it lays hold on the super-natural root of the given natural, without which the latter would have neither essence nor existence; but it is not supernatural in the sense that it appeals to a sphere of existence beyond the natural, a hidden world of super-natural individuals lurking behind the given. It only declines to maintain the usual abstraction of the natural from its supernatural basis, rather considering it in its concrete unity with the latter, immanent in it as being and substance. It is just in the phenomena of true clairvoyance (e.g., corpse-seeing) that no one has ever supposed the cause to lie outside the individual himself; that is to say, the single phenomenal province which mere natural or abstract natural causes will not explain is not claimed by Spiritism.

Moreover, true clairvoyance seems not to occur with professional mediums for the sole reason that they are usually in no relations of intimacy or deep sympathy with the rest of the party, so that the interest of the will in establishing the radical connection fails. For the thought-transference in which mediums have an interest, induction of brain vibrations suffices, there being thus no need at all for the restoration of a telephonic-connection in the background; but there is nothing to excite so deep an interest in the past and future fates of the circle and their relatives and friends, as would compel the unconscious will to draw from the absolute knowledge of its absolute basis. What the Spiritists call clairvoyance in their mediums is not that; true clairvoyance, the tenderest, though morbid, blossom of man's unconscious spirit life, the Spiritists till now know nothing of from their mediums, because the latter carry on their business far too much as a trade. For the development of genuine clairvoyance in mediumistic circles the conditions are far more favourable when private mediums sit with their families, with lovers, and intimate friends; if it occurs here, it may elicit the most startling revelations without driving us to any other source than those in the medium himself, and in his radical connection with his absolute basis.

In concluding this section, I cannot warn too emphatically against extending the theoretical interest, which these phenomena excite, to a practical one, or replacing the former by the latter. That the Tibetan monks have arrived at the development of thought-transference into a kind of telegraphy, implies the absence among them of a natural postal and telegraphic system. We who are in possession of such have no interest at all in accustoming ourselves to psychical actions at a distance, which yet in their hallucinatory form admit only of a very incomplete, inadequate, and uncertain mode of transmitting intelligence. Still more irrational, however, is it to cultivate the gift of clairvoyance. For if anything whatever is adapted to make life endurable, it is ignorance of the future, leaving room for hope and effort.

One who has the misfortune to foresee the deaths of his acquaintances is a mirror allowing the calamities and sufferings of the future to cast their shadows upon the present; his best success will be to keep his visions to himself, and to blunt and harden himself against the joylessness of his morbid capabilities. Since it is only important events that so far excite interest as to elicit prevision, but of the more important events of human life by far the greater part are of a sad and painful nature, it follows that prevision must anticipate far more sufferings than joys; but as these sufferings are not to be averted, the prophetic gift is in defiance of the truth that inevitable grief can never be late enough learnt. Only in quite rare exceptional cases does prevision relate to natural events (shipwrecks, fall of houses, and the like), which threaten man with destruction if he does not withdraw himself; but such hints for avoidance of impending dangers are perhaps more rare than the gruesome irony with which prevision itself too often drives man into calamity in his attempt to escape it. Tradition is full of such instances; of the more recent I will only mention that of the engine-driver, who by moonlight saw the body of his father, as it really lay upon the rails, but angrily drove over it because on the two preceding nights at the same spot he had stopped the train in front of his hallucination for nothing. Whoever possesses the unhappy gift of clairvoyance will do unconditionally well to ignore it as much as possible and in no way to strengthen it by exercise, but rather to lead a sort of life not favourable to its development.

TRANSFIGURATIONS AND MATERIALISATIONS.

If a somnambule is ordered by her magnetiser to be someone else, she fulfils this command with the automaton-like will-lessness and with the hallucinatory vivacity which belong only to the somnambulant consciousness. With a slight cue she transforms herself into the figure and character of another, like an extemporising actress, expresses opinions, sympathies, antipathies, and wishes conformable to the character, and supports her talk by corresponding mimical mien and gestures, if her somnambulism is so deepened as to allow of this. The automaton-like will-lessness of somnambulism cannot be more sharply characterised, than by the readiness with which the somnambule flings off her whole personality, and adopts another diametrically opposed, perhaps, to her age, sex, character, religious belief, and political opinions. Even the human quality is given up, and exchanged for that of an animal designated by the magnetiser; the experiences of somnambulism explain the miracle of Circe naturally, supposing her magnetic force to have been strong enough to hypnotise the companions of Odysseus, and to make them see themselves and each other as swine.

What is possible in provoked somnambulism is so also in auto-somnambulism, whether the latter occurs involuntarily or is spontaneously elicited. As there are insane persons who take themselves for animals and so behave, such insane hallucinations having in former times spread epidemically (were-wolves), so also in spontaneous somnambulism of mediums can there be a self-displacement of the Ego, an inner transfiguration of the personality, manifested by corresponding demeanour, gesture, and speech. The precondition is, that the medium at passing into somnambulism fills the place of the directing magnetiser, i.e., gives by the still waking will the directive for the automaton-like hallucinations. What the persons are into whom the medium, as somnambule, believes himself transfigured, will in such cases depend on the forms most engaging his phantasy, to the appearance of which, as he knows, the expectation of the spectators is directed. As mediums learn to know the tradition of Spiritist circles before they get beyond physical manifestations and thought-reading, it is explicable that certain figures are of stereotyped reproduction with quite different mediums, as Harlequin, Pierrot, Columbine, &c., in the Harlequinade; they call themselves John King, Katie King, &c., and are supplemented by the turbaned Oriental, the pert little girl under different names, and others. With these types the phantasy of mediums has become so familiar that they at once present themselves as figures for the self-displacement of the Ego. Already in masked somnambulism they play their part when the communications, themselves maintaining more or less the character of these types, announce them as the authors of the intelligence conveyed. This persistent tradition, of course, does not prevent phantasy of different mediums conceiving figures peculiar to themselves, of which in the somnambulant state they are delivered, the somnambulant Ego—consciousness flowing over into them, no matter whether along with it an unappropriating consciousness of the persistence of the abandoned Ego asserts itself or not.

It is striking, how great a change of features, deportment, gait, &c., the somnambulant transfiguration can bring about in the external appearance of the somnambule; the size of the figure can apparently increase or decrease, voice and utterance be quite different, and even the turgescence of the skin and the lustre (Feuchtigkeit) of the eye can thus be changed. Even with accomplished mimics, similar changes in a degree astonishing to ordinary people are observable; but the somnambulant transfiguration, by the vivacity and involuntary character of the hallucination, sinks the true personality in the part to be played to a degree which even the greatest dramatic genius, with all its other superiorities, cannot attain, because it still always remains conscious of its transfiguration. The deviation of the voice from the normal can go to involuntary ventriloquism, which notoriously possesses, with other peculiarities, that of altogether deceiving the ear as to the place where the voice originates. With some mediums, already in masked somnambulism different voices speak confusedly together, which announce themselves as proceeding from present but invisible spirits,* and such mediums will also support their mimical transfigurations by sprightly "speaking with tongues." Other mediums, who are not strictly "speaking mediums," confine themselves to mimical transfiguration without support by speech or with sparse addition of detached words.

It is a matter of course that a medium, who in somnambulism has dramatised the Ego into a figure of the phantasy, will involuntarily desire to be attired for the part to be played in conformity with the character assumed, so far as the means are at hand. In this irresponsible state, for instance, an otherwise modest young girl will not feel prevented from taking off her clothes and going about in shirt or chemise; or if the hallucination is an Oriental, linen will be tied round the head for a turban. So far, however, as the available costume is not suited to the part, the medium will take care to keep behind the curtain, and to show only those parts of the body which correspond to the figure of the phantasy.

If the medium has the indefinite, but urgent, impulse to appear in the mimetic transfiguration, so as to fulfil the expectation of the circle, he will involuntarily seek to remove the obstructions to the satisfaction of this impulse, thus to loosen knots and strip off fastenings which the spectators have attached to him for security.

In so far as the somnambulant medium himself believes in his transformation, i.e., feels himself another person, there can be no talk of intentional deception if he presents

* It will be observed that the word "hallucination" does not here denote mere baseless appearance, but a self-clothing of a true intuition with the form of sense, that form even often corresponding exactly, and in minutest detail, with the distant objective or future fact.—Th.

† This hypothesis is carried into more detail, and defended by Prof. Dr. O. Simony in his dissertation "On Spiritistic manifestations from the scientific standpoint." ("Ueber spiritistische Manifestationen vom naturwissenschaftlichen Standpunkt") Vienna, Hartleben, 1884.

himself to the spectators as this other person; and in case he imagines the "other person" as one deceased but surviving in the other world, he acts completely bonâ fide if he comes forward in the chosen costume and mimetic disguise as the apparition of a spirit from the other world. If the spectators do not understand the somnambulic state, whether they believe in the reality of a spirit apparition, or on the other hand lay hold of the "spirit" and "expose" the medium, the latter is in either case just as little to be made responsible. The medium is here just as little spirit as deceiver, but an irresponsible auto-somnambule, to be protected from fright. That there are also fraudulent representations without somnambulism is at the same time not for a moment to be disputed.

According to the best Spiritist authorities, it may be taken that in 95 per cent. of all so-called spirit-apparitions, the medium himself figures as the apparition, putting fraudulent imitations quite out of sight. It is quite vain to hope, by binding the medium to a particular place, to be secure that any apparition away from this place is not the medium; partly because somnambules are astonishingly expert in loosening knots and stripping off fastenings, and partly because, according to Spiritist assertion, the medium can penetrate the matter of the fastenings.* Supposing this assertion to be true, it is also impossible to secure mediums by enveloping them in gauze carried round the seat and sealed, or by caging them; for if the somnambulic medium can penetrate substances, he can produce himself as an apparition notwithstanding all such precaution. That the medium is on the seat at the beginning and close of the cabinet sitting, but meanwhile gets up whenever a form appears (often also without such appearance), is proved by testing the weight of the chair from second to second, although these observations are not to be universally relied upon.†

This much is certain, that if the penetrability of matter by mediums is admitted, the non-identity of medium and apparition must be proved by wholly different means than by material confinement of the medium. Regard has not been had to this, even in the statement that 95 per cent. of the apparitions are substantially the medium himself, so that the 5 per cent. residue may still be much reduced. Whenever the assertion of non-identity rests on no other ground than this material confinement of the medium, it is to be rejected as utterly unproven; everything done by the apparition is in such cases to be conceived as the act of the medium; e.g., when it cuts off and distributes a lock of hair (Ps. St. 1., 487; II., 22) displaces furniture, carries objects round, extends hand or arm, walks about with the spectators and converses with them, has itself photographed (II., 19-20, 22), impresses its feet, hands, or face in molten paraffin, and delivers these impressions to the spectators (VI., 526, 545-548), and so on. All such reports, intended to prove the objective reality of the apparition, are defective, because they dispose of the question of the identity of apparition and medium on the ground of the fastening or confinement of the latter. In America, where mediums "work" in families or gangs, as it were, no value whatever is to be attached to the reports generally, since here door and gate are opened not only to somnambulic confederacy, but also to plain fraud. That hitherto all objects, flowers, samples of raiment, locks of hair, &c., delivered by such apparitions are of earthly origin, the apparitions themselves have not denied when questioned; experts can assess the price of the material per meter quite accurately, and as to the locks of hair, it is to be observed that hair at different parts of the head varies not inconsiderably in shade and colour.

It is asserted by some Spiritists that the apparition is as a rule spatially divided from the medium, and that the latter first, when the apparition is seized, effects a junction with it by sudden penetration of the restraining material, because otherwise death would result. It seems more likely that the apparition, by dissipating itself under the hands of the seizer, and penetration of the material, should hasten back to the medium, than the reverse; but if the medium can so suddenly penetrate the restraining material, as to reunite with the apparition in the moment of danger, one does not see why he should not rather prevent this danger, by quietly going about with and in the apparition.

GLASGOW.—A public debate was held on Sunday evening, September 20th, in the Secular Hall, Ingram-street, Glasgow, between Mr. E. W. Wallis (Affirmative) and Zosenius (Negative). Subject: "Has Man a Conscious Personal Existence after the Change called Death?" The proceedings were laudably conducted under the impartial chairmanship of the Rev. J. Taylor. Both sides were ably set forth, considering the limited time of two hours apportioned to the treatment of so important a subject. Yet the immediate results of the debate were, as might have been expected, unsatisfactory. The subject is evidently not one for debate at all, as was clearly demonstrated at the conclusion of the first hour. Mr. Wallis led the way with the citation of a few well-authenticated typical facts, and invited his opponent and the audience to consider these, and if they would, to sift them also. Zosenius, however, is too skilful a fencer to be outdone by what he chose to term "mere assertions," which neither he nor the audience were then able to prove or repel, and so he had recourse to the somewhat hackneyed subject of "Exposures," of which he succeeded in making not a little capital, to the amusement and satisfaction of those in the audience who were of like mind. Zosenius is clever; quick to take advantage of an adversary's slip, and as quick in dodging an uncomfortable issue. This smartness, indeed, was the salient characteristic of his remarks; for to those who were once sceptical like himself, but are now amongst the ranks of the convinced, his apparent familiarity with the literature of Spiritualism was a mere parade: he has evidently dipped into it only deep enough to find his own depth, or at any rate only to the extent that others whom he deems authorities on the scientific side, have proceeded. So far as he was concerned it was in vain that Mr. Wallis returned to the attack with the recital of mere facts. It was complained that here was no subject for argument or for the exercise of reason. Of course; for how can a subject which is first and foremost a question of fact be satisfactorily debated with an individual who in the first place alleges his own ignorance, and in the second denies a priori that the testimony of others is of any value whatsoever? The subject might have been otherwise introduced. Mr. Wallis might have been prompted to present it philosophically, arguing from matters patent to things obscure—from the visible to the occult—thus inductively laying the basis in reason for the assumption of a spiritual counterpart of things natural; then strengthening his position by the presentation of the evidence of Spiritualism with regard to the persistence of this spiritual counterpart (i.e., the spirit body) subsequent to physical dissolution. But such a procedure would be open to the same kind of attack. First, the philosophy would not be appreciated, and secondly the evidence would not be accepted. There is nothing for it but personal investigation in an earnest but not too positive frame of mind, avoiding the extreme which combined incredulity and egotism lead to, namely, of setting at naught the valuable testimony of other investigators favourable to the subject, whose judgment and intellectual acumen are at least equal to one's own. But if the immediate results were unsatisfactory there can be no doubt that, with earnest thinking minds, the facts adduced as evidence on the affirmative side of the momentous question must eventually assert their own influence and yield their own results.—Sr. MUNGO.

THE SOCIETY FOR PSYCHICAL RESEARCH: ITS THEORIES AND METHODS.

A REPLY TO MR. MYERS.*

I have an extreme dislike to "answering again." I would rather omit some fair points of attack than prolong a controversy. But in this instance I find Mr. Myers' reply so vulnerable, and his language so evasive, that I cannot resist the temptation.

I thank Mr. Myers for calling my attention to a passage which I now read for the first time, for it had quite escaped me, and in which he makes a most important revelation, but thereby only condemns himself and his colleague. The whole passage is so significant that I now reproduce it. He says:—

"In a report written by Mr. Gurney and myself, Proceedings VI., p. 184, these words will be found: 'We have found (in discussing certain evidence) no need to postulate the existence of any intelligences except human minds, and human minds, not in hell or Heaven, but on earth as we know them. But, nevertheless, if other intelligent beings besides those visible to us do in fact exist—if man's own soul survives the tomb—then, no doubt, our telepathic experiments, or our collected cases of apparitions, interpreted as we interpret them, do suggest analogies of influence, modes of operation, which (it is hardly too much to say) would throw a quite novel light over the long controversy between Science and Faith. It is only in some form of idealism that this controversy can find a close.' The italics are mine.

This passage took me quite aback. I was under the innocent delusion that with Mr. Myers and his colleagues the immortality of man, or at least his survival of the tomb, was no moot point, but in their minds an assured certainty and a positive belief. But it now appears they were only groping for an assurance on this point, and hitherto only groping in vain. The darkness still continues, for they say "we have found no need to postulate, &c., &c. . . . But nevertheless, if, &c., &c. . . . it would throw a quite novel light," &c., &c. I regret to find that this at present mere hypothesis of a Hereafter would be to them "a quite novel light," and change all the conditions of the controversy. I should think so, indeed.

Now let us view this passage in the light of telepathy. In their telepathic experiments and collected cases of apparitions they have found no need to postulate the existence of spirits. In other words, the conveyance of "the telepathic impact" over vast distances—over oceans and continents—between two mortal bodies—is so clearly possible and so easily understood, and so free from mystery, that there is no need to postulate any finer powers or existences. The thing is evidently so practicable, that to suppose more than mortal power is quite superfluous. Now this I call the very "ecstasy of madness." I was not aware that flesh and blood had such marvellous endowments.

I affirm, on the contrary, that magnetic influence between mortals cannot safely or probably be imagined to exist beyond very narrow limits. It may exist between persons in the same room, or, say, the same building—when they are within eye-shot or earshot of each other—but not far beyond this small environment. But when it comes to long distances, then, if telepathy be admitted, it is absolutely necessary to postulate other and supernatural existences.

* See correspondence between Mr. G. D. Haughton and Mr. F. W. H. Myers in August Journal of Society for Psychical Research.

Mr. Myers admits the cogency of my argument on this point, and "defies the whole world to controvert it." He admits that telepathy is much more credible, less mysterious, and more conceivable in the case of a spirit to administer the impact, than of a gross mortal. It is certainly so, for a spirit is not pure Thought, or Will, or Emotion, but all these in a vehicle or continent—in one word, in a body. This was what puzzled Lucretius. He could not conceive Soul existing nakedly. Therefore, he rashly said that at death

"The spirit flies out, and dies i'th air."

For, as he could see nothing, he concluded there could be nothing, and this was the end of Man.

Mr. Myers firmly believes in telepathy, but he rejects what he admits to be the easier explanation and the more credible supposition, in order to embrace the more difficult and the less conceivable. He is not in a happy plight, thus halting between two opinions. I said truly that his own admissions only serve to condemn him the more deeply.

I have now fairly got Mr. Myers' "head in chancery," and he cannot wriggle out of it, if he would not be beaten out of wind and time, and be no longer able to come to the scratch, unless by making the sad confession: "But I do not believe in the existence of spirits; I believe in flesh and blood, and in nothing else." Very good. If the case be so, then I would recommend a slight alteration in the title of the Society—henceforth to be called "The Anti-Psychical or Sadduceean Society," after those eminent philosophers of old, "who say there is no resurrection—neither angel nor spirit."

Mr. Myers is evidently still in a fog, but through the mist I hail a streak of dawning light, and I find it in the following pregnant discovery: "It is only in some form of idealism that this controversy can find a close." I had said the same thing in other words: "You cannot compel assent by sheer force of evidence. The mind must first accept principles and be guided by them." The principle in my case is, that this visible universe is an universe of effects, and that beyond it, and to account for it there must be a universe of causes. Or, as it is well expressed, "the things which are seen were not made of things which do appear." The principle to be decided on in limine is—"Is there a Spiritual or Unseen Universe or not?" It is idle to attempt to prosecute psychical research except on this foundation. It throws quite another light on these phenomena and explains what is otherwise inexplicable.

I must pass to another point, the Barkas case. Mr. Myers says of the medium, "I have studied all her printed answers, but unfortunately the gross want of comprehension of the subjects inquired about, and the palpable blunders which the replies contain, seem to me to preclude us from regarding the case as affording evidence of the guidance of a scientific spirit."

This is a palpable blunder on the writer's part, and a monstrous assumption. He assumes that a spirit must be thoroughly and profoundly scientific. What proof, or even presumption, is there that a spirit must necessarily be scientific, and be able to give accurate answers? The question is, whether the answers can be believed to be made by an ignorant woman, never known to have turned her attention to such subjects; whether one wholly ignorant of the rudiments and even the terms of music could attempt to answer deep musical questions, and to answer them, moreover, instantly and rapidly? That is the question. Let Mr. Myers propound the same questions to any ordinary persons—male or female—and ask them to write down answers. I can easily guess the answer he would get.

Let him propound them to young ladies who have had years of musical tuition.

Now I have submitted these questions to three musical men in Southampton, known in the profession. Two of them returned a most favourable opinion, saying they were "deep questions, and the answers were able."

The third is an organist in a Southampton parish church, and his written report to me is: "These answers are nearly all correct to the best of my knowledge. A few of the questions on acoustics I cannot, without reference, vouch for. Some of the answers would be expected to be given in a more lucid manner in any ordinary examination." The italics are his. He is in extensive practice as a regular professor of music, and is understood to be well acquainted with its theory. The value of the answers can be easily put to the test of a report by eminent professors. Why has this not been done? If this has not been done hitherto, let it now be done. At present I am inclined to believe that a mind other than that of Mrs. Esperance—an untalented woman—inspired the answers. Mr. Myers ought to follow up the inquiry exhaustively, and not deal with it in the unsatisfactory manner which he here exhibits. He tries to cover his retreat by insinuating fraud in another case. But the questions and answers stand alone. If there was fraud Mr. Barkas must have been cognisant of it. Why spare him?

Yet Mr. Myers most inconsistently writes: "I consider the case curious and interesting, and I am not surprised at Mr. Barkas' view of it." This is admitting that Mr. Barkas has good arguable grounds for maintaining his view of the case, and yet Mr. Myers refuses to investigate the case further, the while he expects us to receive his own opinion of the answers, as that of a recognised musical oracle!

I must condense what I have to say more in a very few words. As to Mr. Eglington, that déte noire of the Society, I again ask why there is no comment on the séance reported in May. I think I can give the reason. They did not see their way to giving a hostile comment, and they were indisposed to give any other, so they gave none at all. If they had found a flaw, a stinging comment would have been appended to the report. At the séance of February 16th "a very striking phenomenon occurred," but unfortunately Mr. Myers was "requested to leave the room immediately before it." Why does he not say who requested him, and for what reason? But others remained. Why not give their reports? or does Mr. Myers feel a doubt as to their honour and veracity? He will "express no doubt as to the genuineness of this phenomenon." But does he feel any? If not, why does he suppress the description? All this is very inconsistent.

He might be expected to tell us positively whether the old Committee on Physical Phenomena will present a report or no, and why they have kept silent so long. But he leaves us all in the dark. I suspect that no report will be forthcoming.* They perhaps cannot agree on a hostile report, and therefore determine to give none at all.

Again, a report of "the W. séance" is suppressed because Mr. Farmer's presence might in the opinion of "the outside public" have vitiated the whole proceedings. I thought it was a Society who were in search for truth only, without any regard either to the outside or the inside public. The prophet of old had a nobler spirit: he would utter the truth, "whether they will hear or whether they will forbear." I fancy that the same reason will explain this case of silence as well as the foregoing ones.

I am glad to find that Mr. Myers throws overboard Mr. Gurney on the Husk-Wyld case; and Mr. Podmore on the Morrell Theobald case; and that he admits that some further investigation is to be desired in both cases—enough for the present.

We have also received the following communication:—

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—My attention has been called to your issue of the 19th September, in which there appears "An Open Letter to Those Whom it may Concern," by Mr. J. S. Farmer. I gather from the letter addressed to this gentleman that the allusions therein contained refer to the Wendover séances, in which I acted as medium in my non-professional capacity.

I am forced to the conclusion that the apparent unwillingness by those who were present on the occasion to publish the report, which has been jointly prepared and signed by every member of the party, means condemnation of the whole of the proceedings; and that this impression may be confirmed or removed, I beg to add my request to that of Mr. Farmer that the document be forthwith published.—Yours truly,

G. Nottingham-place, W.

W. EGLINTON.

* It is reported that the then secretary of the committee ruthlessly threw away all chance of investigation by making a statement that in these matters all Spiritualists must be regarded as either idiots, dupes, or tricksters. Is this true or not? If it is true the reason for collapse is apparent.

"FACTS AND THEORIES."

Mr. Haughton and your correspondent, "Thymol," insist on "facts first and theories afterwards." In this inductive age that sounds plausible, but I should like to point out the extreme difficulty of getting facts accepted at all—not to say properly interpreted—without the accompaniment of at least tentative and provisional hypotheses. Spiritualists themselves have not, as a rule, accepted their phenomena without a theory, which was to them both credible and explanatory, from their first contact with the facts—a ready-made theory inherited from the world's old tradition. But, as a matter of plain experience, people will not accept evidence, other than personal and palpable, to facts which are to them utterly unintelligible. A century and a half of "enlightenment" has made the spirit theory, if not un-explanatory, at least, as Professor de Morgan said, "ponderously difficult." The result is that, in the absence of an intelligible and working hypothesis, an usually impossible degree of evidence is demanded. We only ask, it is said, for "scientific" evidence. Now, scientific evidence supposes a knowledge of the conditions of a phenomenon, and the power to reproduce and exhibit it at will. We can only offer testimony to the phenomena as they may spontaneously occur under such very general conditions as we know. True, it is testimony which would suffice for any court of justice in the world, if there were no antecedent presumption against the facts: testimony which, according to all human experience, could not be forthcoming for what was not a fact. The "dispassionate critic" thinks he is exercising a scientific judgment. In detecting adverse possibilities, that is so; in refusing an affirmative verdict on account of improbable possibilities—in treating them as probable, when he would not so treat them if he were in a jury-box estimating human testimony at its ordinary value—he is unconsciously the mere mental slave of the Zeit-Geist. Because he cannot say "I know," he will not say "I believe." He cannot help it, for really he does not believe. But give him a theory he can understand, and he will soon find the evidence quite satisfactory.

Now, the foregoing remarks may be formulated into a law of human progress the exact reverse of the rule recommended by your correspondent. Theories first, facts afterwards; in other words, which will not seem so paradoxical but amount to just the same thing: the form of intelligence is prior to its content. Facts follow thought; we only notice a fact at all when it begins to have some significance for us. This is common experience. The facts, of course, are in the world, and these facts are at present in the custody of Spiritualists, for the most part, with their theory. They want other people to accept them naked of all hypothesis, if one particular investiture does not happen to suit the understanding of the recipients. In vain! But all the mental obstruction, the latent prejudice expressed by the proposition that evidence must bear proportion to "improbability," evaporates as soon as a hypothesis offers itself which makes the facts less unintelligible, and therefore less "improbable." A priori improbability only means unintelligibility. Does anyone suppose, for instance, that von Hartmann would have come before the world virtually accepting the evidence of all these phenomena, and urging public recognition of them for further investigation, had he not found them adaptable to his own scientific and philosophical categories? And will it not be a great thing gained for the progress of the subject if by these or similar ingenuities the a priori bias against evidence can be overcome? I say nothing at present of the intrinsic merits of the theories, though it must be doubted whether those who alight their importance have as yet made any real effort to understand them.

MENTAL TELEPHONE.—Mr. D. L. Calverley has a store in front of his house in this town. His wife attends to it when he is out on business journeys. Last May 4th, when she supposed him to be in Florida, the store-bell was rung; Mrs. Calverley answering, found the ringing was not, as she expected, by a customer, but by her husband, returned by some sudden exigency. Their daughter at school, twenty-five miles off, while at her books, heard the familiar sound of the store-bell at home, and had, at the same time, a vivid impression that it was rung by her father. She wrote by next post about it to her mother.—Granite State News, Wolfborough, N. H.

[In this column will be given from time to time such accounts of psychical phenomena as seem to be worthy of permanent record. (1) That a colourless statement of facts without comment is given; and (2) that communications are accompanied by the names and addresses of those concerned, not necessarily for publication, though we should naturally prefer to be at liberty to publish them. CLASS E.—PRESCIENT DREAMS.

A friend of mine, Miss D., has on several occasions had dreams foreshadowing with more or less exactitude occurrences that have shortly afterwards befallen her.

In the summer of 1875, when lodging in a street near Eaton-square, she dreamt that Mr. W., an acquaintance of hers whom she did not often see, called on her and told her that a friend of his was at a house in the street, the number of which he did not know, and wished to find out. Upon this Miss D. looked out of a window on the second floor, and saw on the wall of the opposite house in large raised letters in yellow and white, a name of two syllables beginning with W, and ending with TH, but the intervening letters she could not make out. She told Mr. W. that that was the house where his friend was. In the morning she told her sister she had had a most ridiculous dream which she proceeded to relate to her. A few days afterwards Mr. W. actually called at the house, and said that a friend of his of the name of Walworth had died at a house in that street, and he wished to ascertain the house at which the death had taken place. Miss D., whose maid had mentioned to her having seen a coffin carried that morning into some house in the street, went upstairs to inquire the number, and looking out of the same window from which she had looked out in her dream she saw that the blinds (of a dull yellow) were all drawn down in No. 33 opposite, and she told Mr. W. that that was doubtless the house where his friend had died. The singular fulfilment of the dream, however, did not even then occur to her until it was pointed out to her by her sister. They subsequently moved into No. 33, where Miss D. told me the story in March, 1876, in the presence of her sister, pointing out to me the yellow blinds and white curtains of the drawing-room. She afterwards revised my account. She knew no one of the name of Walworth, and had not heard that a family of that name was in the street.

Some years previous to the above, when returning to England, Miss D. fell asleep in the train between Lyons and Paris, and dreamt that she took up the Times and read among the deaths, "On the 29th June, at Boulogne, of gastric fever, Mary, daughter of the late Colonel D." She was not feeling at all ill at the time, only rather tired, and said nothing of the dream to her sister. They went on to Boulogne, intending to cross at once, but there she felt so ill they had to call in a doctor. She saw at once from his face that it was something serious, and he pronounced it to be gastric fever, which subsequently turned to typhoid, in which she was frequently delirious. In the intervals, as it approached the end of June, she puzzled her sister by asking repeatedly what the day of the month was. About that date, however, she took a turn for the better, and recovered after three months' illness, instead of completely verifying the dream by dying.

CLASS K.—SPIRIT IDENTITY.

[The following narration, received from a lady who has desired her name not to be published, is full of most interesting facts. A critical mind might possibly here and there find food for observation. Let it add the sauce of its mature experience. We have held it unnecessary to vex the spirit of our correspondent with questions upon minute points.]

Two years ago I was on a visit to a friend who knew nothing at all about Spiritualism. She was interested in what I told her, and wished to see for herself, so in the evening we formed a circle, my friend, a lady who is her companion, and myself. In less than ten minutes the table began to tilt; I found they were both mediums, and they have sat often since. I am not a medium, yet at that first trial when I took off my hand the table was still. It has not been so since. Several names of Miss T.'s relatives were spelt out. I asked, "Is any one else here?" "Yes." "Who?" "Imagine my dismay when the words 'Old Gringuffin' were rapped. 'Who is that?' said Miss T., with a laugh. I knew, and said, 'I am sorry I called you such a name, but I never forgot your kindness in bringing me biscuits when I was ill.' 'Oh,' she said, 'it's father.' 'Old Gringuffin' was a name which I had given more than thirty years before to her father. I had forgotten it, and I am sure she had never heard it or the other lady either. Then the words, 'I forgive,' were spelt out. Three years ago my sister's husband died suddenly. I came up as soon as I knew, told my sister of my certain knowledge of our dear lost ones' presence still, and she wished to have a séance. Accordingly we drew round a little table, my sister and her daughter, I and H. For nearly an hour there was nothing, then my daughter's hand began to rap on the table, and she all at once exclaimed, 'Why that's the tune uncle was showing us how to rap out with the pencil last week.' Immediately the table began to tilt, his name was rapped out. Then I asked, 'Who did you meet just first?' The answer came, 'Montague.' My sister thought it was her little boy of that name, who died when an infant, but another word followed, 'Pitcher.' My sister burst into tears; she was convinced. None of us at the table had ever heard the name, she had forgotten it, but it was the name of an old friend who had been lost years ago in the 'Royal Charter.' Then came the letters 'r u.' I said, 'He means, Are you in any difficulty?' Approving raps followed. I replied 'Yes. A. wants to know to whom she is to refer about your books; should she send for one of your old clerks?' An emphatic 'No' was rapped. Then two names of friends were mentioned, but objected to. I said, 'Can you tell her?' 'Yes.' Then, letter by letter, was rapped out: 'Consult George W.' (My sister sent for this gentleman and found, what she was not quite sure of before, that he was her husband's agent.) She had forgotten him. Then I said there was a letter of condolence on the table behind, from a Freemasons' Lodge, could he read it? 'Yes.' We all distinctly heard the rustle of the paper.

Ever since that time when my brother comes at our séances he announces his presence by playing that little tune, sometimes by the hand of the medium, sometimes by the leg of the table, and once by a piece of loose paper which shook it out on the table.

My daughters, who were the best mediums, E. and H., are gone to the Cape. My servant, who was a medium, has left, and for months I only have a sitting when I get the chance; but lately I have discovered that a servant I have is a good medium. She is a very good, quiet girl. A fortnight ago my sister was on a visit to me, and we had a sitting, Lizzie (my servant) being the medium. My sister has the curious power of developing mediumship in others, though she is not a medium, but she is never allowed to sit at the table. This evening, as usual, she was told to sit back, and then the table jiggled away with Lizzie across the room, jerky little movements. Lizzie's right hand lay lightly on the table, and the left all the while played the well-known little tune. I am quite sure she never could have heard anything about it, for she has not been with us very long, and we have not spoken about it.

Two years ago on S.'s birthday, M. made a wreath for his grave, and sent it up to H. In the evening, as we sat at our séance, the table began to rap out this tune, and we found that he had come to thank M. for the wreath.

One evening the table suddenly took a different motion, and I asked, 'Is any one else here?' 'Yes.' 'Who?'

"Lottie." The last letter had just been rapped when we heard the front door opened and a well-known voice cried "Anybody at home?" It was my son who had come unexpectedly from London and who was accompanied by his cousin. A fortnight before this cousin had lost a little girl whose name was "Lottie."

The first message we had when Lizzie and I sat together, about a month ago, was to her from her mother. It was, "I am always putting good thoughts in your mind."

Last week, after telling my husband all the news I could think of from my Cape letters, he told me a curious little thing which I have written to the Cape to verify, but I know it is true because he always tells me the truth. Then he said, "You might go to Miss Lottie Fowler." I do not know why, but I shall certainly go.

CLASS F.—AN APPARITION.

Upon the evening of the 29th September, 1864, my daughter and I were walking up and down the avenue of my place of residence, where trees and shrubs grew rather thickly on both sides. Suddenly I saw a very small, hazy appearance under the branches of a sycamore tree, which gradually emerged into the open, and, rapidly increasing in height and distinctness, took up its position under an ash tree, from which it commenced to advance towards us, being then about five feet in height, and having the outline of a female figure, enveloped in a white, flowing veil. My daughter had walked up to this time with her eyes fixed upon the ground, as we were engaged in earnest conversation, and had not remarked the appearance which I had been gazing at for some time; but suddenly looking up, was much frightened, and staggered back; then, turning round without saying a word, she walked rapidly towards the house. I accompanied her, and looking back more than once, I saw the figure had risen several feet from the ground, and was floating in the air nearly over the spot we had just left. Arriving at the house, she rushed into the sitting-room, where several members of my family were assembled, and sank, nearly fainting, into a chair. I said, "Which of you will come with me? We have seen a ghost upon the avenue." My youngest son started up, and without losing a moment we ran back to the spot, which was now devoid of any appearance, supernatural or otherwise.

A day or two afterwards we were informed of the death, at that precise moment, of an aunt, which took place unexpectedly. September 7th, 1885.

CARA.

We addressed some questions to "Cara," with regard to this narrative, which, with the answers obligingly returned to us, we now give:—

1. Will you kindly say the means you have of being certain that the 29th September, 1864, is the correct date of the appearance?

Mrs. Mary Fleming actually did depart this life about eight o'clock, p.m., 29th September, 1864, of which I was immediately informed, and at once connected her death with the appearance.

2. Were you informed in the letter of the exact moment of the aunt's death, or did you discover it by subsequent inquiry?

My husband often heard from his uncle the precise time at which his wife died.

3. Would you ask your son and daughter to give their accounts of the affair?

My son did not see anything, and is in India now. My daughter died on October 11th, 1865, being one year and twelve days after the appearance.

4. Have you seen any other apparitions; if so, how many?

I have; four or five.

5. Were you or your daughter at all superstitious, or went to talk about ghostly matters?

I might be regarded as of a superstitious turn, from a relation of what I have seen and heard; my daughter very little so. At the time of the appearance, my daughter and I were talking of her grandmother, who had died six years before, but had no thought about the aunt. Not much given at that time to talk of ghostly matters.

6. Were you either of you short-sighted at all?

No; we had both good sight.

7. What was the exact time of the evening, or as near as possible? Was the moon shining? How dark was it?

As near as I can say, eight o'clock. Moon not shining. Duskish.

8. How far from you to the apparition when nearest?

Three feet.

9. Did it occur to you at the moment that the appearance was like your aunt?

It was impossible to discern a feature, as there was apparently a thick, white veil over face and form.

10. Did your daughter see it without having her attention drawn to it by you?

Certainly; as I was cautious not to draw her attention to it.

CARA.

"Cara" adds, in a letter, that these answers are "accurately correct." The peculiar circumstances under which the appearance was first and last seen, and the nearness to which it approached the seers, exclude the idea that they were deceived by a human counterfeit. The theory of an illusion is blocked also by the nearness, and by the fact that the moon was not shining, whose beams alone can be conceived as capable of producing so potent an effect. "Cara," it will be observed, has seen other appearances of like nature, but we have yet to receive accounts of these; and that this was a simple hallucination is rendered highly improbable both by the fact that it was seen by the two persons present without suggestion from one to the other, and by the fact that it was actually coincident with the death of a near relative. But was it even a hallucination due to an impression received in the sensorium, projected? Had it not rather objective reality, the brain receiving the impression of it in the ordinary way through the eyes? If the former, and not the latter, would any telepathic kindly explain what flaw there is in our knowledge or our reasoning when we assert that, inasmuch as the apparition was seen at one point, and, the gaze averted, not seen—reverted, seen again, it had as much an existence independent of the brain (however stimulated within), as the table on which we write, and which upon our leaving and subsequent return to the room, we shall find in the same place?]

CLASS R.—SPEAKING WITH TONGUES.

[The following example of "speaking with tongues" necessarily eludes a fuller description than our correspondent has so well, within the limits possible, given of it. Not any of the sitters knew Italian. We hope, however, that it will draw our readers' attention to the subject. We should be very glad if we could receive other accounts, either of speaking or of writing in languages previously unknown to the medium.]

My daughter, aged seventeen, had sat many times with me in our family circle; but, except by the constant moving of her hands, did not show that she was a medium. One evening three lady friends sat with us. In a short time my daughter rose, stepped out into the room, and, to my great amazement, began to sing in Italian. I had no idea that she had so fine a voice, but I am sure that she did not know one word of Italian, nor did either of the sitters, the medium, my cook, being a very good girl and very quiet, but not knowing Italian, and ignorant other ways. My daughter talked and sang for quite an hour. All her gestures and her tones were Italian. We could detect a word here and there, but we all regretted our ignorance of the language. Some months afterwards a sceptical friend, a Dutch lady, sat with us, and she asked questions and received answers in Italian; but the influence was unpleasant, discordant. My daughter could not speak with readiness, and used some Dutch words. I believed that the intelligence trying to control her was obstructed by some other, and was very glad when the door was suddenly opened, and another daughter, who is very sensitive, but who does not sit, because she is not strong, came quickly up to H., and putting a hand upon her head, said "Go!" when H. became herself, and went out with her sister. This sister had been sitting alone reading, when she felt strongly impressed to go to H.

W. G.

["W. G." has responded to a letter from us with additional information of an interesting nature.]

With regard to your first series of questions: "Is your daughter unconscious when singing Italian?" my reply is that I have heard both the girls say that they hear themselves speaking, but it is as if it were someone else. E. in particular was always wishing that she could be quite unconscious, she was so afraid of the involuntary action of her own mind; but in the case of speaking a foreign language—H. Italian, and E. some soft, unknown tongue—their own minds could have had nothing to do with it. "Were any of the words taken down?" Two or three were, which I remembered from their repetition; they are jotted down on the back of a book, from which I copy them. I don't know about the spelling, I was guided by my ear; no sequence, only a word here and there: "Grazia" or "grattzia," "dolce," "mio povera," "amico," "e vero vero." That is all. She sang, also, "Bonnie Dundee" in Italian, and a translation for the last word was "Dundae."

"Did the Dutch lady know Italian?" Only a little. She asked, "Are you a woman?" which was received with a peal of laughter, and the answer was "No, no, signor." "Were you a singer?" "No, but I sang." These words were in Italian. Then the influence became mixed, the voice harsh, the words gibberish. I said, "I wish you would speak English," and she began: "I will if I will, but I won't," "I will if I would, but I won't," and so on until she caught the phrase, "I will if I can, but I can't," which she kept repeating, drumming on the table. At this point my other daughter came in and released her. "Did your daughter know any words of Dutch?" No, I believe not; but certainly not the words she used. She struck her head with her hand, and said, "Dowe kop." Fräulein said it meant "stupid head." When my daughter had left we had tilts, and in answer to who was the control, Fräulein's father was named; and I understood by her shrug and tone, and the words, "I did not expect that, but I am glad you can come," that there had been something unpleasant. Then first I realised that we had been playing with edged tools, for H. told her sister she was so glad when she came, for she felt frightened, as if she might do herself an injury. I had most thoughtlessly, in my ignorance of conditions, exposed my darling to an adverse influence, and I told her she had better not sit again. I have referred to my daughter E. speaking in an unknown tongue. The first time she did so I put down many of the words, which I enclose just as I wrote them: Arisipito, aussimolnigo, augego, ausomorri, olemodeyo, gnolly, speranger, ollyllo moss-hair, aussimula, children, doloroso. My little son told me, at a seance, that it is a compound language, the "man" having lived in South America.

The fact of Lord Erskine's belief in the apparition of his father's butler, related in "LIGHT" of September 26th, is authenticated by a passage in the "Diary of Sir Walter Scott, for April, 1829," quoted in the Quarterly Review, October, 1882, p. 334. Sir Walter says: "Tom Erskine was positively mad. I have heard him tell a cock-and-a-bull story of having seen the ghost of his father's servant, John Burnett, with as much gravity as if he believed every word he was saying," which no doubt he did.

A PHYSICAL INTIMATION OF DEATH AT A DISTANCE.

(Psychische Studien for September.)

A correspondent, Carl Alexander Schulz, of Leipzig, relates the following experiences of his own. Residing in a suburb of Leipzig, many years ago, he was in the habit of walking about alone in his room after the conclusion of his work—printing music—which was often prolonged into the night. On the wall of the room hung three framed portraits, two of deceased friends, one, the largest (thirty inches long, and of corresponding breadth), of a living friend, the head of a society in Dresden, of which the narrator was an active member. "One evening, after work, it was eleven o'clock, when in the course of my usual promenade, I stopped before the pictures, and addressed some friendly words of loving remembrance to the friends who had gone before. Suddenly the larger picture, which hung in the middle, was raised so far from the wall that it must certainly have been lifted off the hook, had it not been held by some power unperceived by me. After remaining suspended for a very short while, it fell back into its place, striking the wall with a loud sound. I was surprised, but not at all alarmed. I spoke again to the three portraits, asking if there were any communication to be made, but there was nothing further. Now, was the above a sign of him who was still alive, or a manifestation from those who were departed? The next day brought the solution. I undressed and went to bed, but was kept long awake by my reflections.

"Having on the following afternoon to go into the inner town upon business, I met in the suburb, in the middle of Tanchaer-street, an acquaintance who came towards me walking on the other side. He was at that time serving brother of a Freemason Lodge of this place. Recognising me, he called out across the street, 'Have you heard? Have you heard?' I replied that I knew nothing, and begged him to come across. He did so, and told me as follows: 'The Chairman died suddenly yesterday evening at eleven o'clock.' The Worshipful Master had held a lodge-conference at the Golden Apple at Dresden. When the business was over he stepped down from the dais to speak with the brothers, as was usual. While conversing he suddenly put both hands to his eyes, and cried with a troubled voice, 'It is quite dark to me!' sank on the floor, and died. An apoplexy had ended his earthly life."

The comments of Herr Wittig (editorial secretary of Psychische Studien) may interest those who think that our own Society for Psychical Research is urging the explanation of phenomena by thought-transference too far. That Society has not as yet got even to the recognition of the facts of mediumistic physical phenomena, but it seems that telepathy will still have a great part to play when this important advance is made.

"We have here, quite evidently," says Herr Wittig, "the contemporaneous manifestation of a dying person, as long as he can still act physically and psychically at a distance upon his environment by his physical nerve-apparatus. Whether, if the action were his, it was intentional is, of course, not ascertainable. But, unintentionally and unconsciously, the sudden excitement of his death sensation was so exalted that the fact transported itself (as, according to our conviction, all facts do, even if less perceived) upon the psychical vibrations of thought-transference, through the medium of the nerve electricity connecting us all, to the predisposed narrator, who was already in mental discourse with the originals of the pictures, so that in him, and through him, the perception of the death, unconsciously received, partly through the already established thought rapport of the dying man with him, partly through the shock of the witnesses of the sudden stroke, ferewith converted itself into a counter-nerve-impulse (Nervengegenstosse), which moved the picture sensibly for him, as described. . . . It is with two or more persons in sensitive rapport as with two or more connected telephones. One telephone receiving words from another, repeats the sound. The nerve-impulse of the shock at the sudden death of their chairman transmitted itself to the recipient already in thought connection, and received through him, unconsciously, the right directive to the corresponding picture on the wall. A similar mystical, but sensible relation occurred between Goethe and Napoleon I. during the Leipzig tumult."

"According to all former experience, we must suppose that the picture was raised by the nerve-fluid of the narrator, whoever may have been the inciter. The narrator was thus at this moment of his mental contemplation himself the medium. We may suppose that his memory of the two deceased may have contributed to raise his psychical condition to the stadium of physical mediumistic perception and manifestation of a distant death scene." Herr Wittig proceeds to refer to a former experience related by the late wife of the same correspondent, which has a very similar interest.

Her grandfather had often expressed a wish that the mendicant choir-boys should sing at his funeral. Her brother seems to have been one of these boys, and when the grandfather was dying the boy's uniform hat and cloak were hanging on a peg in a room where the family were collected in expectation of the death, the children sitting crying on their bed. "Suddenly, without any perceptible occasion, my brother's uniform clothes were raised from the hook and flung to the ground with such a loud noise that we all cried out in fright. Later examination showed that both the hook and the attachment loops of the clothes and hat were in the best condition, and nothing was injured. And as the hook bent considerably up, the things must have been lifted. Some minutes after this strange incident our mother came in, having, as we learnt afterwards, just heard the noise, and, said with tears in her eyes, 'Children! your grandfather is just gone (dead).'" Herr Wittig goes on to explain this case, as the last, by thought-transference eliciting physical mediumship, the manifestation being produced and directed by the nerve force thus derived from the recipient of psychical impression.

A SUGGESTION OF WIDE APPLICATION.—The door is open for many a wealthy Spiritualist to do good without much charge upon themselves. Hundreds of Spiritualists long for the weekly visit of the Golden Gate, but cannot subscribe for it. Now if our richer friends would, when they order their own, contribute a trifle to aid in sending the paper to the worthy poor, they would send sunshine into their hearts which would reflect back into their own. They might name those to whom they would like the paper to be sent. Some of our subscribers have started a Free Subscription Fund, and papers are forwarded to addresses they furnish. To this list we shall be happy to add the names of other friends.—Golden Gate.

SPIRITUALISM IN AMERICA.

(From The Truthseeker.)

For some time past there have been indications that the cultivated Unitarians of America, and some of their strongest ministers, have been entertaining strangers, and perhaps angels, but not altogether "unawares." In plain English, they have been paying serious and sympathetic attention to Spiritualism. In the Christian Register (Boston), the Rev. Herman Snow, for instance, writes as follows:—

"Will you allow to an old friend and supporter of the Unitarian faith space in your columns adequate to a condensed statement of what may be regarded as established facts, in regard to the so-called Modern Spiritualism? I will try to be brief and to the point, holding myself ready to verify what I may now give, mainly, as unsupported statements.

"In the spring of 1852, while temporarily supplying one of our vacant New England pulpits, I was favoured with an excellent opportunity for investigating the claims of the new faith, entirely within the limits of the family which had been assigned as my home. Here, after several weeks of the closest attention to the subject,—under conditions utterly precluding the idea of fraud or even of a desire to mislead,—what I had begun as a repulsive duty ended in a conviction that the leading claim advanced was founded on the truth; and from that down to the present time, having all the while made this rather a speciality of my efforts, I have found no occasion to reconsider my decision. I still believe that, amid all the wonderful advancements and discoveries of the age, immortals of the Beyond have discovered a method of sending, through material instrumentalities, something like telegraphic messages to those in the mortal body,—a method which, though still imperfect, may yet become so far perfected as to be of inestimable value to our race.

"Let me now try, briefly, to express some of my present thoughts upon the subject. The leading phenomena, material and mental, I regard as established beyond reasonable doubt. Their genuineness is now affirmed and defended by no insignificant share of the intelligence and integrity of the civilised world. But few—and those only whose attention has been but superficially given to the subject—will now venture to affirm fraud and delusion as a satisfactory explanation to the entire mass of these modern wonders; and to those who, like the writer, have been in close relations with these phenomena for more than a quarter of a century, any such explanation seems shallow indeed. I have been perfectly surfeited with these wonders. I no longer seek or desire them. My great study now is, How can they be utilised for the good of mankind? It should not be denied, however, or overlooked, that delusion and fraud have closely followed the genuine of these phenomena or that these fraudulent imitations have been largely on the increase. To such an extent has this been the case that, among the better class of Spiritualists themselves, strenuous efforts are being put forth that the evil may be checked and removed.

"But, while thus admitting the general claim of Spiritualism, it should also be admitted that there is within its range a wide and peculiarly difficult field of inquiry, demanding a close and patient attention, in order that reasonably satisfactory results may be reached. From the very nature of the case there must be developed in such an inquiry—among the unseen intelligences, I mean—various degrees of mental and spiritual advancement as well as of moral obliquity and degradation. For the world with which we are now in direct and conscious communication is made up of all the varieties of character existing here, it being colonised from our earthly life. They are not the wise and the good only who go from our midst over the river of death; but also the foolish and the false, the selfish and the base. And it is with all these various shades of character that we are liable to come in contact, when we make use of this new telegraphic communication, opened, as it is, through natural law to the use of the entire masses of human intelligence,—to all who do but conform to the established conditions. Hence, these manifestations from the unseen life assume almost every variety of mental and moral shade, even as do the manifestations which come from humanity still in the mortal form; and hence, also, the different and widely divergent tendencies of Spiritualism as a movement or reform force in the world's advancement. I will now briefly notice some of the more prominent of these tendencies. One of these is made up of recruits from Materialism and the other forms of infidelity. But few are aware of the extent of the inroads made by Spiritualism in a direction apparently so unpromising. But probably more persons have thus been converted from a positive unbelief to a firm faith in the life to come, within the last thirty years, than had been done through other agencies during the entire century previous. And the change wrought upon this class of minds, many of them of advanced capacity and intelligence, must have been of the highest significance, and one that could have been accomplished only through a contact with the most positive proofs. But, as a natural result, most of these infidelistic converts have still retained much of their old antagonism to the Bible and Christianity. It should be borne in mind, however, that it is the old Calvinism, and not the liberal forms of Christian faith, that writers and speakers of this description have had in mind when giving forth their severe denunciations against the popular churches and their worship.

"The other extreme of the movement consists of persons of reverent and religious tendencies, who have been brought up closely under the influence of the Christian churches, many of them, indeed, being in actual church fellowship. Their adoption of the faith that spirits are able to communicate with mortals does not necessarily and at once essentially change their old belief, though such a result is sure to follow in the end; that is, if theirs has been the faith of the "evangelical" creeds, as, almost without exception, no support whatever is found for the special points of the old theology in what is received as coming from the spirit world. For the present, therefore, such persons, largely swayed by influences of a social and personal nature, still remain in their old religious homes, their new belief being kept cautiously in the background. The extent of this esoteric Spiritualism is not likely to be over-estimated. It prevails everywhere,—not only in the churches, but in all secular organisations and also among isolated individuals. Yet is this extended prevalence far from being understood and acknowledged. On the contrary, it is often the case that, in respect to their belief in Spiritualism, intimate friends, for a time at least, remain as strangers to each other.

"Besides these two extremes in Spiritualism, there is another prominent phase of the movement, upon which, as it seems to me, those claiming to be liberal Christians should look with especial favour as being almost identically in their own line of thought and effort. This is, largely, an embodiment of radical and independent thought and deep spiritual experience. Persons upon this plane are free to investigate in all directions, and ever to accept the good and the true. And, while following on in this spirit of perfect but reverent freedom, they have found it to be true, not only that human beings survive the event called death, but that they retain the power to come into close and conscious relations with those remaining upon earth, and of still imparting to their fellow-beings influences both for good and evil, and that often they may become to us messengers of truths of transcendent importance. And it is to such clearer and more enlarged views of spiritual truth and human destiny, and not to the signs and wonders nor even to a personal communication with departed loved ones, that such Spiritualists give the strength of their efforts. To this class, Spiritualism is but the natural outgrowth of the past religions, especially of that taught by Jesus of Nazareth, the great Spiritualist and reformer of his own age. Between his teachings, rightly understood, and a rational view of Modern Spiritualism, it is believed that there is no antagonism, but a natural harmony like that between the ascending scale of musical notes. Spiritualists of this class are watchful against anything like narrowness in the growth of the movement, many of them not wishing to see it combined into any sect or party whatever. They rather encourage a quiet diffusion of the faith among all classes, through methods peculiarly its own. For this new power works not naturally in the old machinery, but with a quiet, irresistible force in ways heretofore but little known. The ultimate result must be a gradual breaking up of old errors and evils, and the establishment among men of the higher ways of the unseen world.

"In conclusion, let me affirm that the progress of this modern Spiritualism has been utterly unprecedented. Never before in the world's history has there been a faith of so rapid growth. Within a space of less than forty years, the number of believers in our own land has come to be reckoned by millions; while, in the world at large, it is only by tens of millions that an adequate estimate can be approximated. There is not a civilised country to be found in which there are not large numbers of intelligent believers. Innumerable books and periodicals in defence and elucidation of the faith are also to be met with in all quarters. Surely, a growth like this, amid the intelligence of the nineteenth century, indicates something more than shallow pretence or self-deception. To thoughtful and reverent minds, it must be apparent that some deeply significant reality lurks behind what has power so widely and deeply to move the human mind and heart; and that, whatever may be the earlier mistakes and crudities of the movement, the ultimate result must be some important good to the race."

THE LATE MR. WALTER WELDON.

The following obituary notice appeared in the Times of September 24th:—

A correspondent writes:—Mr. Walter Weldon, F.R.S., F.C.S., Chevalier of the Legion of Honour, one of the five men and the only foreigner whom the French Société d'Encouragement has deemed worthy of its "grand medal," died of persistent overwork on Sunday last. To him the country is indebted for the process by which alone bleaching powder is now made. The peroxide of manganese employed to liberate chlorine from the hydrochloric acid obtained, the first step of the soda manufacture, was formerly thrown away. By a very simple process Mr. Weldon recovered from 90 to 95 per cent. of the manganese in a form available for renewed use, and thus saved nearly £6 on every ton of bleaching powder made, quadrupled the total manufacture, made the industrial world the richer by some three-quarters of a million sterling per annum, and, as the French chemist, J. R. Dumas, publicly observed, "cheapened every sheet of paper and every yard of calico made in the world."

In early life Mr. Weldon was associated with literature by the establishment of "Weldon's Register of Literature, Science, and Art," a monthly journal giving a survey of current literature and an abstract of the best books as they appeared, in separate articles by competent writers, but carefully revised and sometimes rewritten by his own hand; and which journal also furnished a record of the progress of Science and Art. This work is in itself an interesting and valuable library, and there is no question Mr. Weldon would have made his mark in literature if he had not soon quitted it for that work of scientific discovery and invention in which he became so distinguished. It would have taken many a lifetime to work out all the inventions with which his teeming mind was occupied. Mr. Weldon was a confirmed Spiritualist. At the meeting of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, when Spiritualism was discussed under the able chairmanship of Mr. Alfred Russel Wallace, Mr. Weldon courageously bore his testimony and related some of his personal experiences in Spiritualism.

The last time the writer had a conversation with Mr. Weldon was at a meeting of the Spiritual Alliance, when a paper was read by his old friend Mr. A. A. Watts. He was also an intimate friend of Mr. and Mrs. Howitt, and on the death of the former he erected a memorial to his memory in the Tyrol.

Mr. Weldon had a frank, genial nature, and gained the love of all who were brought into intimate association with him. His premature death at the age of fifty-three is a loss to science and the world. To his friends the only consolation is that he is now removed from trouble and suffering into reunion with his beloved wife, children, and friends, in a world where he will find free exercise for all the higher activities of his generous and noble nature.

A PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

By "M. A. (Oxon.)."

It now wants but a bare month of a full year since an unfortunate accident wholly disabled me during some six months from attending in any way to my work, and has since seriously curtailed my power of accomplishing what I used to find easy. I have just returned to London after a pleasant and very beneficial holiday, so far restored as to be anxious to resume my old work. The accumulation of correspondences during my illness I can never hope to deal satisfactorily with. I must beg all whom I have seemed to neglect to believe that no discourtesy was intended, and that I was absolutely unable to reply to many communications. Amongst those with which I could not deal are, I regret to find, a number of letters from various Spiritualist Societies in various parts of the world, which came to hand at a time when I was most seriously ill. These were replies to a letter which, at the instance of the London Spiritualist Alliance, I addressed to many societies and journals representing Spiritualism in foreign countries. The Alliance wished to enter into confederation with foreign societies of a like nature for mutual benefit. The replies to my letter contain many valuable suggestions which I propose to lay before the Alliance at the first opportunity, in as public a manner as possible. But I am anxious to apologise at once to my many correspondents for the unavoidable delay in dealing with their courteous and kindly communications, and to explain the reason for my long silence. The forthcoming issue of the Alliance will give me an opportunity of laying before English Spiritualists what they will find a very interesting and instructive account of the state of Spiritualism throughout the world, as it bears on this projected confederation amongst us.

I am desirous also of stating, in reply to the wishes of many readers of "LIGHT," that I propose to recommence the series of "Notes by the Way" in January next. It is only prudent to refrain from pledging myself to regular weekly work until I know whether my restored strength is equal to the effort. Three months of winter will show me how cold affects me, and I hope confidently to find myself justified in resuming my Notes in the first number of the next volume of "LIGHT."

Meantime I have placed at the disposal of the Editor the continuation and, so far as the evidence is concerned, the completion of my "Phases of Materialisation," which will occupy more space than I like to contemplate, but which deals comprehensively and, I hope, completely with a very complex subject. This chapter of research will, when it has appeared in "LIGHT," be added to those other chapters which appeared many years since in the now defunct magazine, Human Nature, and form a volume which I hope to publish next year.

I am also collecting, for publication in a volume, some of my Notes that have appeared during the past four years in this journal. They have dealt week by week (up to November last) with various subjects, some of which seem to possess a more than transitory interest; and I believe I shall do well to place at the service of the public such of them as I may select as of some permanent interest. This volume, if all goes well, should be ready for issue in the coming spring.

MR. J. G. MEYER left London for Calcutta on Wednesday last.

"POLTERGEIST" disturbances of the usual character are reported from the village of Grenzendorf, in the upper circle of Glatz.

THE list of works advertised in our columns has received several additions, notably as regards practical handbooks on Mesmerism and allied topics.

MORITZ WIRTH reviews E. von Hartmann's "Der Spiritismus," extensive extracts from which are given in another article. The reviewer considers that after the treatment the subject has received from opponents in Germany, this pamphlet "saves the honour of German thought, of German science."

WE have in hand for publication in the next issue of "LIGHT" reports of several remarkable sances with Mr. Eglinton, who seems in great power just now. In one of the reports we have received strong additional testimony for the phenomenon of the materialisation of the human form, the medium and the whole process being under the fullest observation.

WE have been favoured with an advance copy of the etching of Mr. W. Eglinton, upon which M. Tissot, the eminent French artist, has been engaged for some time. In this portrait, which is intended for the forthcoming volume "Twixt Two Worlds," he has been singularly happy in catching the dreamy expression which is often observed in mediums during the period when manifestations take place. And it is, perhaps, unnecessary for us to say that the etching is a most finished and beautiful work of art, and in every respect worthy the reputation which this distinguished artist enjoys.

THE STONE-THROWING PHENOMENON AGAIN.

The following recent case of this phenomenon at Belgrade, is translated into German from the Servian for Psychische Studien (September).

"From the residents in Timok-street (Belgrade) comes the complaint that since Thursday, on every evening, beginning at nine o'clock, no one can pass along the street for the large stones which are violently flung into it. The police have been endeavouring to apprehend the stone-throwers, but hitherto without success. The credulous world accept as fact the story of some deceiver that the stone-throwing proceeds from vampires from the churchyard. It will all amount to nothing, but that some deceivers hope by spreading such vampire tales to frighten the people so as to carry on their 'business' more easily. The people may be afraid of vampires, but all means must be taken to discover where these adventurers hide themselves, and whence they throw the stones. The police should be supported for their detection, so that no one should be injured by the stones." (Neues Belgrader Tageblatt, No. 160, of 25th seventh month [6th August], 1885.) "In yesterday's number we mentioned certain stone-throwing in Timok-street, opposite the churchyard, but the police are still unable to obtain a clue. On Wednesday evening thirty gendarmes and some military were posted at the place, and notwithstanding the most zealous investigation by the authorities, still no trace was found, although stones were thrown of such a size that it seems incredible that human force could have flung them to such a distance. The gendarmes were distributed over the whole churchyard, but found nothing. In our opinion, either crafty vagabonds are trying to frighten people for facilities of depredation, or soldiers of the Belgrade circle contingent are amusing themselves with the people." (Id. No. 161, 26th seventh month [7th August], 1885.) "The Editoriate have received the following letter:—Mr. Editor, I read in your valuable paper of the stone-throwing in Timok-street. As the affair much interested me, and there was not a word about it in the police report, I repaired yesterday evening to the street in question, to convince myself of the truth of the accounts. Arrived at the churchyard, I observed a number of persons, and on approaching, found them talking of stone-throwing, vampires, and so on. I asked one of them about Timok-street, and was told that it reached from the churchyard to the hotel 'Schumadinaz.' I then went along the street, in which a great concourse of people were swaying up and down, as at an annual fair. Gendarmes, military, gentlemen, labourers, old and young of both sexes, were to be seen. I approached a group in order to ascertain their ideas on this new event. But at the moment stones fell as from the sky. The crowd ran under the eaves of the houses, and the gendarmes and soldiers to the churchyard, to detect the perpetrators. After some time they returned, but empty-handed. That was enough for me, because I have completely satisfied myself of the truth of your notice. As to the occurrence itself, I believe I can say, from what I could hear about it, that the stones are flung by very clever rascals with an evil intention. In my opinion these rogues must be hidden somewhere near upon the roofs, it being impossible that such large stones should be flung far. The authorities must search all the buildings around, and will then, perhaps, succeed in apprehending the rogues. I hope the authorities will understand how to proceed." (Id. No. 162 of 27th seventh month [8th August], 1885.)

There have been no further reports. Even the police report, which the Official Gazette publishes daily, and which informs the public of even the most insignificant cases, has, up to this time, never mentioned the enigmatical hail of stone. (Translated from the Servian into German by the Medical Doctor.—i.—r.)

"In Psychische Studien are to be found a whole succession of remarkable phenomena of so-called stone-throwing. See for year 1878, pp. 379, 427; 1879, p. 523; 1880, pp. 237, 238, 562; 1881, January, February, March, April, p. 188; May, p. 238; October, p. 471; 1884, January and February. Lastly, in this current September number, p. 397. In the last-named Leipzig cases the vague suggestion was made that boys may have shot the pieces of coal with catapults over the roofs into the yard. They were being traced, and were to be made severely answerable; but up to date there has been no police-court report. We must thus for good or evil adhere to invisible or still unknown agencies. These could be of three sorts. (1) We have possibly to do with a kind of meteoric phenomena, of which the laws of projection to certain points of our earth are not yet known; so that it is a material omission in the newspaper reports that nothing is said exactly of the nature of the large stones thrown (how thrown?) even in the Belgrade case. So also exact information of the direction of the throwing would be important. Accordingly this case cannot be referred with certainty to such meteoric cause. (2) We might, according to experiences in the province of mediumship, with justice infer an unknown psychic in the neighbourhood, by whose nerve electric forces at high tension similar movements of objects are caused. . . . (3) In the last resort we are referred for an explanation to Vampirism,* and the poltergeists of popular belief, which may at least co-operate in the unconscious dreamy imagination of psychics." (The note concludes by further insisting on the necessity of scientific examination of the stones before theorising about their projection, and by referring to E. von Hartmann's suggestion that there should be official reports upon all such phenomena.)

REVIEW.

WHISPERINGS. POEMS. By E. A. Tietkins. Price 3s. 6d. London: Sampson Low. To be obtained of the Psychological Press, 16, Craven-street, Strand, and all Booksellers.

Mr. Tietkins, who enjoys a high reputation in the musical world, has in this tastefully got-up volume shown considerable poetic genius. The poems throughout exhibit an ability, which is somewhat rare, to grasp and comprehend the subtler issues of life and thought, and the imagery in which he has clothed his ideas is at all times sweet, and oftentimes powerfully graphic. The author, as many of our readers are aware, is a Spiritualist, and in his "Whisperings" he has given no uncertain sound as regards his knowledge. Indeed, throughout these musings its importance and necessity as an educational influence "on human hearts in every mood" is enforced and driven home by apt illustration. Especially is this noticeable in the poem entitled "The Invisible Presence," which, if space permitted, we should have liked to quote in full.

"Is death painful?" is a question answered in the negative by Dr. Beardsley in the Tempe, an interesting scientific explanation being given of the chemical processes immediately preceding death, the development of carbonic acid making the ganglia insensitive.

On Friday, October 2nd, 1885, at eight o'clock, an Inspirational Discourse will, by desire, be delivered by Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, at the Public Hall, Croydon, on "Socialism, from the Standpoint of Spiritualism." Fifteen minutes will be devoted to answering questions. After the address, an impromptu poem will be given on a subject to be selected by the audience. Admission is free. A collection at the doors will be made to defray the necessary expenses.

THE North German Allgemeine Zeitung reports the case of a cataleptic girl at Lublitz, in Upper Silesia. She had learnt neither to read nor write, but fell suddenly into a condition in which she repeated many prayers by heart, and gave information on matters of which she had before no knowledge. She often remained in the cataleptic state three whole days, motionless and unconscious, without any nourishment, but answered questions addressed to her. She is supposed to have intercourse with deceased persons, and many resort to her for communication with their departed relatives. "It is certainly the fact," says the Hamburg Altoner Tribune "that things apparently supernatural happen with this girl, but it is certainly desirable that the state of the case should be ascertained from a competent quarter."

THE exposure of the medium, Frau Töpfer, by a late member of the Spiritualist Union at Leipzig, has obtained wide publicity through the columns of the Leipzig Tageblatt, and has led to suggestions of complicity with the medium against Professor Cyriax, president of the Union, and editor of Spiritualistische Blätter. These suggestions are repelled, it seems effectively, by Professor Cyriax in a later number of the Tageblatt. Frau Töpfer was one of the mediums with whom Baron Hellenbach experimented. It is scarcely possible to read his detailed accounts in Geburt und Tod and doubt her powers as a medium at that time, though Hellenbach expressly declares her physical agency in many cases ("So gewiss diese Thatsache ist, ebenso gewiss ist, dass Frau Töpfer sehr oft leiblich als Gestalt hinter dem Vorhange fungirte," p. 115)—a fact which he emphasises by the type.

By EDUARD VON HARTMANN.

There is, however, in fact, a province of phenomena, where the possibility that the apparition is the medium is excluded, and this province encroaches upon that of transfigurations of the medium, in so far as the apparition of the latter shows changes in size, form, complexion, beard, and dress, utterly unattainable by means at the service of the medium in the cabinet. When before the sitting the medium is closely searched, has even exchanged his own clothes for others of easily recognisable cut and colour, the locality being under strict control, it is not to be seen whence the medium should get the means of disguise, how he should provide himself with white gauzy raiment, stout material with heavy draperies, beards, turbans, masks, buskins, &c. If, nevertheless, the spectators see him appear as figures of different age, sex, size, clothing, nationality, &c., other causes of this phenomenon must be sought for.

What may help us on the right road, is first the circumstance, that such uncommon and apparently inexplicable phenomena seldom or never appear to spectators present for the first time at a mediumistic sitting, and that even frequenters must with a new medium go through many sittings where only physical phenomena occur, until the medium's own somnambulant consciousness announces that the time is come for attempting transfigurations. It is an universal experience that phenomena are more plentiful and extraordinary, the more sittings the medium has held with the same circle, and that every newly introduced member interrupts or quite arrests progress. It follows that close rapport between medium and participators must be established, before transfigurations and materialisations can succeed, and that depends, not on mere human, friendly, relations between their waking consciousnesses, but only on a relation between their somnambulant consciousnesses, i.e., on a magnetic rapport.

The physical phenomena progress in proportion as the participators are trained to be unconscious auxiliary mediums, as they learn, that is, to give off more and more nerve force, and to make over this to the disposal of the medium; the ideality of the manifestations is the more astonishing, the more they expose themselves to the medium's will to thought-reading, suffer to be implanted in them the unconscious will to thought-transference to the medium, and let themselves be stimulated by the medium to the development of a masked somnambulant consciousness of the hyperaesthetic somnambulant memory. When their latent mediumship has been thus in some degree awakened, and the magnetic power of the unconscious will of the medium over their masked somnambulant consciousness is sufficiently established, the medium, whose somnambulant consciousness is very sensible of this concurrence of auxiliary mediums, can pass on to phenomena which presuppose a certain power over the souls of the spectators.

With different members of a small circle, the power obtained by the medium in the course of preceding sittings will be different; consequently the amount of phenomena confirmed by different spectators must be different. This fact is seldom enough regarded; instead of each spectator giving his own report, without consultation with the rest, of every sitting, the party agree upon a common account, in which the subjective diversity of the phenomena disappears. Whereas it is easy to agree upon the physical phenomena (except lights), with transfigurations and materialisations it is often quite otherwise, especially on their first appearance; afterwards, when all the party have fallen sufficiently under the power of the medium, in this province also the testimonies will be again more consentient.

At first the medium usually only puts out for a few moments before the curtain single parts of the body, hands, arms, head; gradually showing the whole upper body or quite emerging. Then at once it appears that some of the spectators think they recognise the medium without a doubt, and see nothing else whatever than his form, while others, with a sort of mutual agreement, declare the apparition to have been essentially different from the medium. Similarly at table-sittings in the light, individuals present have seen different shaped hands come from under the table, at a considerable distance from the medium, whose hands lay visible to all upon the table, while the others have seen nothing whatever of this. Evidently, in such cases there is a transfer of the medium's hallucinations into the somnambulant consciousnesses of the sufficiently sensitive of the party, for we have seen already how favourable to hallucination-transference the relations in such a situation are.

With us Westerns, consciously or unconsciously-willed hallucination-transference to a recipient in waking consciousness, who has not the will to be hallucinated, and does not at all suspect that the figure perceived by him is the transferred hallucination of a third person, is something extremely uncommon. But the history of religious excitements affords a number of examples of whole assemblies of ecstasies infected as much by hallucinations as by convulsions and Vitus-dance, when, it is true, speech powerfully assists in giving definite direction to the phantasies of the recipients. Examples of this kind are, moreover, to be found in all those cases where living or dying waking or dreaming persons transport themselves with ardent longing and hallucinatory vividness into the proximity of another at a distance, and produce in the latter, by the rapport thus restored, a corresponding hallucination of their personal presence. (Ps. St. VI., 294, 344; VII., 47, et seq.) Here it is to be remarked, first, that the success of the experiment with sufficiently sensitive recipients seems not dependent upon knowledge of their locality for the time being, so that thought can be directed to it, and second, that if generally the environment of the recipient is represented in both consciousnesses, its perspective still appears different in each, according to the actual or supposed position in it of the seer. Transference in Europe seems seldom to have extended to other hallucinations than the personal apparitions of the transferor; only in "second-sight" or true clairvoyance infection of hallucinations by the true seer to predisposed companions appears to occur.*

On the other hand, cases of hallucination-transference are more frequently reported of Indian fakirs and Turkish dervishes. One is made, for instance, to see a coil of poisonous snakes beneath a raised cloth, where immediately afterwards nothing is visible (Ps. St. IV., 200); or in a closed room is seen at one time a flock of wild geese flying; at another a number of snakes curling about; at another the walls drawing together as if they were about to crush one. (IX., 469, 470.)

Recently magnetisers have produced the phenomenon of transference of hallucinations even in public representations, but have first placed the recipients in the hypnotic state, and, moreover, made use of the word of command in order to educe the hallucination. They have thus caused a substance with a nasty taste to be eaten for one with a pleasant taste, a staff to be seen as a snake, and excited the belief that the magnetiser was floating about in the air (Ps. St. III., 536, 537), and so on. What with the help of speech a magnetiser awake can do with a perfect stranger in open somnambulism is possible without speech to a somnambulant magnetiser with a masked somnambulant who is

* See Ps. St. IX., 152-154, for a very evident case of this. The instance adduced by Schopenhauer (Parerga, 2nd Ed., I., 316-317) is quite simply explained by the fact that the imprisoned medium had the hallucination, which he transferred to the fellow-prisoners who had fallen under his magnetic influence, twice in sleep and only on the third occasion when awake, so that the agreement of the apparition seen by the others on the two first occasions with the simultaneous dream image of the sleeping medium could not be tested. It is highly probable that animals are also susceptible to the transference of hallucinations (comp. that animals are also susceptible to the relative preponderance of the middle it would not be surprising if with the relative preponderance of the middle train in animals their average susceptibility to this should be greater than that of human beings.

† See "LIGHT," September 9th, 1882, for a translation of this case.—Tr.]

better known to him; what in the above-mentioned instance is possible with sensitive recipients at a far distance, is possible with non-sensitive recipients in proximity. If the urgent wish of the somnambulist transferor is not to transfer his hallucination of his personal presence to a distant recipient, but is rather directed to transfer to a recipient close by his hallucination of the personal presence of deceased spirits, there will be a corresponding change of the recipient's perception. If, for instance, the medium has the hallucination that he is no longer himself, but, say, the spirit of John King or Katie King, the hallucination will pass to the recipient that the medium stepping in front of the curtain is no longer the medium but John King or Katie King. If, in another case, the medium has the illusion that from the pit of his stomach a mist develops, and out of the mist a spirit form, the fascinated spectator will likewise have the same hallucination. (IX., 83; IV., 546-548.)

Psychiatry distinguishes between hallucinations in the narrower sense, and illusions, understanding by the former a product of the phantasy without a foundation of sense-perception, by the latter phantastic transformations of sense-perceptions. So that it is an hallucination if a coiled-up snake is seen lying on a plate, but an illusion if a stick or rope is taken for a snake; an hallucination, if a misty form is seen growing out of a medium, but an illusion, if the medium himself is seen as the apparition of a spirit. Moreover, the boundary is fluid, hallucination and illusion passing into one another, for apart from conditions in which sense-perception is closed, every hallucination must dispossess a segment of sense-perception, and introduce itself among the momentary collective sense-perceptions, and on the other hand there are illusions in which transformation of the completely contrary sense-perception at their foundation seem to be more difficult than would be an original construction on a neutral ground. Thus illusions and hallucinations pass into one another when at one time the medium himself is regarded as a wholly different figure; at another an apparition very like the medium is mistaken for the latter; or lastly, medium and phantom are seen to separate and come together again. With slight deviations of the form from the medium (as in Crookes' observations) hallucination-transference is evidently facilitated by the medium coming forward; when the deviations are great, hallucination may be easier to implant than illusion.

Ordinarily, perception of the same phenomenon by several observers is sufficient guarantee of its objectivity; but this is no longer the case when the relations are exceptionally favourable to hallucination-transference. For although here also identity of the transcendent cause may be concluded from agreement of the effect, yet this identical cause is not here a material thing (in itself) in real objective space, affecting the senses of those present, but the subjective hallucination of the medium, affecting the somnambulist consciousness by induction of similar brain vibrations. In these cases, therefore, we have to look for other marks of distinction between perception and hallucination.

When a form is seen, with opportunity of contact, and the hand passes through without resistance, the probability that there is here a bare vision, or hallucination of sight, will doubtless be very great, but this is no certainty, for there are bodily forms of matter in such conditions of aggregation that their surfaces reflect light, but are not perceptible by touch. It seems to be a sure test of the objectivity of forms, known to be different from the medium by observing them originate and disappear, that they cast a shadow, are reflected in a mirror (Owen), appear magnified or reduced when seen through magnifying or diminishing glasses, and are duplicated by a prism. Nevertheless, this would be a fallacious conclusion, for hallucinations have all these properties also; indeed, the magnifying and diminishing through glasses, and the duplication through a prism is made use of in psychiatry, like distention and contraction of the pupils on approximation and removal of the form, as a test to distinguish genuine hallucinations from mere representations of the phantasy, or feigned hallucinations. Photography alone can afford a safe proof of the hallucinatory character of a seen form, when plates of sufficient sensitiveness for the apparent light-strength of the apparition show no chemical impression. With self-luminous phenomena, usually, as already remarked, the super-frangible rays so predominate, that the plate shows impressions even when non-sensitive observers see nothing at all; but with phenomena not possessing self-illuminating power, momentarily flashing electric curve-lamps, or burning magnesium wire, will give a sudden illumination sufficient to secure positive results in case of the objectivity of the phenomenon.

In fact, all photographic experiments hitherto attempted with forms which were seen by the spectators tell against the objectivity of the phenomena, for in all cases hitherto reported there were no results except when the medium himself was admitted into the photograph. In the latter cases the pictures are not distinct enough for it to be decided whether, besides the form of the medium, the illusion disguising him has also attained to photographic reproduction; in other words, whether the photograph obtained resembles the phantom, and not merely the medium inherent in it. The photograph taken by Crookes, on which is to be seen the medium simultaneously with the phantom, is exposed to the strong suspicion that instead of the supposed phantom the medium, and instead of the supposed medium the dress of the medium, stuffed with a cushion in a half-concealed position, have been photographed. Since material restraint of the medium affords no security, a simultaneous taking of medium and phantom would have to be shown, before objectivity could be conceded to apparitions perceived merely by the sight of the spectators.* All photographs hitherto produced, which seem to fulfil this condition, have turned out to be either the fraud of speculative photographers (Ps. St. II., 338, 345), or are much open to the suspicion of having been deceptively manufactured by too zealous Spiritists for the conversion of unbelievers.†

Ordinarily, detection of a possible deception of one sense is sought by help of the other senses, the agreement of several being considered sufficient guarantee of objectivity. This is quite enough, when the question is of particular sense-deceptions in waking consciousness, but not when it is of actual hallucinations, i.e., transferences from the somnambulist into the waking consciousness; for here the number of the senses sharing the hallucination rises with the vivacity of the latter. The weakest degree of hallucination concerns only a single sense, either that of touch alone (contacts by invisible hands), or of hearing alone (storm-bells, fire-bells, music of the spheres, war-alarms, human voices), or of smell alone (characteristic scent of a person or locality), or of sight alone. With increasing energy of the somnambulist consciousness, hallucination of one sense evokes the feelings and perceptions naturally associated with it of the other senses, when the accessory feeling elicited may enter consciousness even before the principal hallucination, should the dramatic course of the whole hallucination so require it. For instance, one first hears the outer door unlocked, opened, and closed, then steps in the hall, then the room door open, and then first occurs vision, while in less vivid cases the accompanying and preceding hallucination of hearing is absent, and the room door seems to open without sound, if the form does not enter through the closed door. The vision now approaching the observer, if the latter recognises in it an acquaintance, the hallucination of the smell of scent commonly used by the acquaintance may very easily associate itself, and finally, the figure may lay a hand upon his shoulder, the hallucination of touch being then associated. These combined hallucinations of four senses will, however, not afford the least guarantee for the objectivity of the apparition; rather will the well-founded presumption, that one of these different feelings of sense is hallucinatory, suffice as foundation for the suspicion that they are all so, and originate from a common hallucinatory source.

* [Dr. von Hartmann will, I am sure, not object to a quotation here from Mr. Crookes, that readers may appreciate the extent to which collective hallucination must be supposed to go, if only the photographic test above required is sufficient to exclude that possibility. "During the photographic sittings, Katie" (the spirit) "muffled her medium's head up in a shawl to prevent the light falling upon her face. I frequently drew the curtain on one side while Katie was standing near, and it was a common thing, for the seven or eight of us in the laboratory to see Miss Cook" (the medium) "and Katie at the same time, under the full blaze of the electric light. We did not on these occasions see the face of the medium because of the shawl, but we saw her hands and feet; we saw her move unaided under the influence of the intense light, and we heard her speak occasionally. I have one photograph of the two together, but Katie is seated in front of Miss Cook's head." (Hartley misc.)—Crookes' "Phenomena of Spiritualism" (Burns, 1874), p. 109.—Tn.]

Applying these principles to mediumistic phenomena, from the well-founded presumption of the hallucinatory constitution of visible phantoms, we have to derive the suspicion that feelings of touch also, associated with these visions, or alternating with them, are mere hallucinations. It is true we must here be on our guard against over-hasty generalisation, as is already shown by the circumstance that hitherto hallucinations of hearing do not seem to have been observed at mediumistic sittings, the voices heard being rather the somnambulically feigned voice of the medium. Only if it is true that several voices appear to come from different parts of the room, not only in quick alternation, but sometimes also in the strict sense of the word intermingle speech simultaneously: only then would it be necessary to speak of mediumistic hallucinations of hearing.

As to hallucinations of touch in particular, the possibility remains that felt pressure of invisible or visionary hands, feet, &c., is also derived from a system of dynamical push-and-pull lines, presenting the analogy of the pressure of hand-surfaces without corporeity behind them, just as impressions of this sort may be supposed to arise. Whether in the particular case there is a dynamical influence of mediumistic nerve force, or only a transferred hallucination, is not to be determined from the simultaneous visibility or invisibility of the supposed hand; for as a dream can create in itself the suitable sense-perceptions, so also may the vision of a hand be fused for consciousness with a really perceived hand-pressure (without hand) into the unity of an apparent object of perception, just as well as hallucinations of sight and touch of the hand might be fused for the unity of an apparent object of perception. This fusion for the unity of an apparent object belongs even to the content of the hallucination to be transferred, in so far as the medium's own somnambulist consciousness has already accomplished this fusion; and indeed it is then quite indifferent, whether the medium has fused the visual hallucination of the hand with the phantasy image of the tactile hallucination to be produced, or with the phantasy image of the tactile perception to be produced by his mediumistic nerve force.

Should the part of the observer's body which is supposed to be pressed be undoubtedly outside the medium's range of action, it is certain that one has only to do with combined hallucinations of sight and touch; in other cases there remains a doubt, which can only be decided in favour of a combination of visual hallucination with real impressions of mediumistic nerve force, if the same supposed hand or foot, without interruption of its visibility, immediately afterwards effects a permanent impression on a suitable material. This experiment, so far as I am aware, has never been made; I know of only one isolated report, that in a materialisation sitting an impression of a simultaneously visible (but not palpable) child's foot was produced (Ps. St. VII., 397), and this when the curtain, behind which the medium sat, was raised, thus undoubtedly within the medium's range of action.*

This report requires, first, confirmation by similar observations of others; yet it receives some support from various instances, weakly attested it is true, which are said to have spontaneously occurred outside mediumistic sittings.

Someone, for example, is reminded of a person by seeing, in a half-somnambulist state, a hand near him write the name of the person in question; or a ship is caused to alter its course, and to save a wrecked vessel by the steersman seeing in the cabin the captain of a strange ship sitting and writing, the words "steer to the west" being thereupon found in the ship's book in a strange writing. Should the view not be preferred, that the writing was produced unconsciously, and without subsequent recollection, by the hands of observers themselves in the somnambulist state, there remains only the assumption that they were spontaneous writing mediums, with the capacity for writing at a distance, and that in this way, thus themselves writing at a distance, they brought to consciousness ideas transferred to them from a distance, or resulting from their clairvoyance, while at the same time they had the vision of a strange hand or person writing. It would not be surprising, if in the case of writing at a distance by mediums also,† it should thereupon be reported that the strange writing hand had been seen by the observers, which up to the present has not happened, so far as I am aware, at least not at sittings in the light; but that would not afford the least ground for seeking in such visible hand anything else than a transferred hallucination of sight.

The case is similar, when seen forms, as to which there is a certainty that they are pure hallucinations and not mere illusions, raise material objects, carry them about, hand them to a spectator, take them back, and restore them to their places. All this may form part of the transferred hallucinations, as well as the approximation of the walls of the room in the example above mentioned; but it can be proved by the changed positions of particular objects after the sitting that there has been actually an objective displacement of material things. When these movements have happened within the range of action of the medium's nerve force, and do not exceed the mode and strength of performances by means of this force, there is no reason for referring them to any other cause. The somnambulist medium has then fused his hallucination of the presented forms with the figuration by phantasy of the displacements of objects, has unconsciously effected the latter by his mediumistic nerve force, having himself the honest belief that the forms of his phantasy have effected these displacements by their own power; by transference of his hallucination to the spectators he has then also at the same time transferred to them the involuntary conviction that the seen displacements of things are effected by the hallucinated forms.

Further, I know no report of such movements of material things by phantoms, from which it appears that the reporters had been aware of the necessity and difficulty of distinguishing between hallucinations and illusions; all reports of this sort up to the present suggest the supposition that the supposed exhibitions of the force by the forms were simply muscular performances by the mediums, who were resident in (drinsteckten) the phantom.

When an apparition tears off its veil pieces which dissolve like cobwebs between the fingers of the spectator, and when it thereupon repairs the holes in the veil by shaking it out, it is clear that this is a case of combined hallucinations of sight and touch. When, on the other hand, the figure lets the spectator cut off pieces from its garment, which feel stout, like earthly material, a doubt arises whether there is here hallucination of touch, or an apport of a real object. If the samples, likewise, afterwards dissolve, or are not to be found after the sitting, their hallucinatory character is to be considered proved; if they afterwards exist, and can be priced per piece, their reality, and at the same time their earthly derivation are indubitable. When a figure standing within the range of the medium's action, wears a piece of earthly material, there remains the possibility that the medium, by his nerve force, keeps this material suspended and approaches it to the spectator, and by the same force applies scissors for the cutting, all in hallucinatory projection upon the visionary form, which need not for all that have, itself, the least reality. More obviously suggested, certainly, is the suspicion that a form wearing earthly material and cutting pieces from it with scissors is no hallucination, but an illusion superinduced upon the medium, who is the agent. Just because this form is illusory, that is, bears in itself a number of hallucinatory elements, can it also wear hallucinatory attire (veil, &c.), which for touch appears as dissolving cobweb, or impalpable nothing.

* [Wirkungssphäre. The "action" here referred to is that of the mediumistic nerve force. There is no suggestion of ordinary physical action.—Tn.]

It will be for future materialisation-sittings, above all, to distinguish, first, whether the forms seen are illusions or hallucinations; secondly, whether in the latter case their supposed actions leave behind durable effects which can be exhibited; and, thirdly, whether such effects have been accomplished within or external to the range of action of the medium's nerve force. That a form is a pure hallucination, and not an illusion, is only to be established by the test, that either the hand grasps through it, or its origination or disappearance is observed (Ps. St. VI., 292; IX., 146, 147), or it is seen at the same time with the somnambule medium, when confederacy is unquestionably excluded (VIII., 435; IX., 157; Hellenbach's "Geburt und Tod," 114). These proofs failing, there is always only to be admitted an illusion which includes the medium, because this case is the common one, and the pure hallucination of detached phantoms is the rare exception. At all events, it is once more to be remembered that this proximate supposition is not excluded when the medium is bound or confined in a cage.

Existing reports from Spiritist circles up to now seem to me to contain no statements whatever which could necessitate our going beyond the proximate explanation by hallucination-transference, in combination with the action at a distance of mediumistic nerve force. Nothing has ever been reported of durable mechanical effects by pure phantoms, detached, that is, from the medium, beyond the range of the latter's nerve force. So long as this is not the case, it seems to me scientifically unwarranted to attribute objective reality to the alleged subjective apparitions, and to devise hypotheses for the explanation of them as objectively real apparitions. Experiments for determining alteration of weight of the medium during the appearance of the apparitions, and the weight of the apparitions themselves by their stepping on a weighing machine, seem well adapted to bring this question to a decision, if by a self-registering apparatus the possibility was excluded of hallucinatory reading off during the sitting; but against this is the circumstance, that in consequence of charging with mediumistic nerve force, the medium himself, even without giving off matter to the apparition, may considerably diminish his weight, and may in the same way dynamically weight the machine while the apparition appears to be upon it, also without the apparition itself possessing reality and weight. Thus, by this means nothing can be established with certainty.*

Further, even supposing the Spiritists to be right in assuming that the medium gives off part of his organic matter, and thereout constructs a form of materiality which gradually increases in density, still would not only the whole matter of this objectively real apparition thus be derived from the bodily organism of the medium, but also its form from the somnambule phantasy of the medium, and the dynamical effects possibly developed by it from the nerve force of the medium; it would be, do, and effect nothing than what the somnambule phantasy of the medium prescribed to it and realised by means of the forces and substances of his organism at its disposal. Even in this case no pretext would be given for recourse to another cause than the medium, as has been comprehensively and convincingly shown by Janisch.* Meanwhile, until quite different proof is adduced than hitherto, the term "materialisation" must be decidedly rejected as misleading and unwarranted; the phantoms of so-called materialisation-sittings are, after all which can be said of them up to the present, really only phantoms, i.e., subjective phenomena without objective reality, but phenomena, the relative agreement of which in the spectators is explained by their origin in the somnambule medium's hallucination, transferred to the spectators.

FRANCE.—A new organ of the Press, to be devoted to psychology and sociology, is announced to appear at Lyons. It will bear the title of Le Spirite.

The Gnostic's second number is attractive. Among its articles is one on "Occult Phenomena in Shakespeare," some columns of "Occult Phenomena at Home and Abroad," and "Testimonies of Eminent Men concerning Psychical Phenomena," of which here is one. Professor Challis, of the Chair of Astronomy, Cambridge, wrote in 1862: "I have been unable to resist the testimony to such [Spiritualist] facts, coming from so many independent sources, and from such a number of witnesses. . . . In short, the testimony has been so abundant and contemporaneous, that either the facts must be admitted, or the possibility of certifying facts by human testimony must be given up."

The editor of the South Australian Times has been speaking out nobly in defence of Spiritualism, and in an issue of that paper just to hand, we find he has been compelled to publish a four-page supplement entirely devoted to letters for and against the subject, so great has been the interest taken since the veteran Spiritualist, Mr. C. Reimers, started the controversy in that paper some months since. In a leading article upon Spiritualism, the editor concludes thus: "Even, therefore, did we find the investigation of Spiritualism prohibited by ecclesiastical authority; even did we find that the facts of 'Spiritualism' were in contradiction to accepted Christian doctrine, we should still hold it to be man's duty to fearlessly and fully investigate in the full conviction that to whatever is pure, holy, and true, no injury can result by inquiry. Nor will any attempted suppression of inquiry be permanently effective, for eventually it will inevitably be found that 'Truth is immortal and shall live; error is mortal and shall die.'"

SCHOPPENHAUER's works are criticised in the Revue Littéraire et Politique of July 18th. The writer, A. Basine, says: "Before entering upon an examination of Schopenhauer's philosophy, we have to inform readers that he believed in apparitions, dreams, presentiments, witchcraft, amulets, and rapping spirits. . . . He believed that there is an indwelling being with every one of us, who sees all the present concerning us, and knows our future, but who cannot manifest his presence except under certain conditions, such, for instance, as in the state of somnambulism; that this mysterious indwelling being is ever endeavouring to give us good counsel; and that it is he who communicates with us by movements and raps of tables, &c. . . . He believed in a supernatural world with which magicians (mediums?) are in rapport, and to which they are able to give us access. He believed that law ruling in the universe may be temporarily superseded by Will; that before Will there is neither gravity, space, time, nor causality. . . . He had no doubt as to the ultimate triumph of his doctrine, which he called a Revelation or Inspiration by the Spirit of Truth."

Don't waste life in doubts and fears; spend yourself on the work before you, well assured that the right performance of this hour's duties will be the best preparation for the hours or ages that follow it.—EMERSON.

THE FAMOUS PROPHECY OF CAZOTTE.

The belief in prophecy which has been entertained by liberal-minded and religious persons from the most ancient times, and which has been opposed chiefly by modern animalism, is so well sustained by examples of successful prophecy that no well balanced and well-disciplined mind can reject it. Of course we cannot recognise as well-disciplined the minds that yield passively either to social vulgarism or to college dogmatism.

The prediction of Monsieur Cazotte concerning the events of the French Reign of Terror, recorded by the celebrated writer, J. F. de la Harpe, the companion of Voltaire, in his posthumous memoirs, published at Paris, 1806, is in several respects the most satisfactory of modern prophecies. Professor Gregory says: "It was well known in all its details, both in Paris and London, at times when everyone thought it a mere dream. I have seen persons who heard of it very soon after it was delivered, and who remembered hearing it ridiculed in society as absurd. It is particularly worthy of notice that Cazotte, who was a man of a very peculiar turn of mind, and much addicted to the study of occult science, was also subject to fits of abstraction, reverie or dreaming, in which he seems to have been clairvoyant, and that this was far from being the only occasion in which he uttered predictions which were verified."

La Harpe says: "It appears to me but yesterday, and yet it was early in 1788.* We were dining with one of the members of our Academy, a man of rank and talent. The guests were numerous, and of all ranks; courtiers, lawyers, writers, Academicians, &c.; as usual, they had feasted. At dessert, the wines of Malvoisie and Constantia gave to the gaiety of the company that sort of licence not always discreet; they had arrived at that pitch where anything was allowable to raise a laugh. Chamfort had read to us some of his impious and libertine tales; and the great ladies had listened without having recourse to their fans. Then arose a deluge of jokes on religion. One quoted a tirade of La Pucelle, and then recollected these philosophic verses by Diderot:—

'Et des boyaux du dernier prêtre and applauded them. A third rose, and holding a brimming glass said: 'Sirs, I am sure that there is no God, as I am that Homer is a fool'; and in fact he was sure of one as of the other. The conversation then became more serious. They were full of admiration at the revolution effected by Voltaire, and agreed that he had thus won the highest title to glory. He had given the prevailing tone to his age, and was equally read in the ante-chamber and the drawing-room. One of the guests told us, with bursts of laughter, that his hairdresser had said to him, 'You see, sir, although I am no more than a poor apprentice barber, I have no more religion than the others.' It was agreed that the revolution would soon be completed; and that superstition and fanaticism must absolutely give way to philosophy; and we set about calculating the probable time of its supremacy, and who among them would witness the advent of the age of reason. The aged lamented the improbability of their beholding it; while the young rejoiced in the hope of seeing it reach its meridian glory. The Academy was, above all, congratulated on having prepared the great work, and on having been the principal promoters of liberty of thought. One alone of the guests had not taken part in the gaiety of the conversation, and had even passed a few quiet jokes on our fine enthusiasm. It was Cazotte, an amiable and original man, but unfortunately infatuated with the reveries of the Illuminati. He took up the conversation, and in a serious tone said: 'Gentlemen, be content. You will all witness this grand and sublime revolution that you so much desire. You know I am a little inclined to prophecy. I repeat, you will see it.' They replied by the well-known line, 'No need to be a sorcerer to see that.' 'Be it so; but perhaps a little of the prophetic spirit is necessary to foresee what remains for me to tell you. Do you know what will be the result of this revolution—what will happen to you all? Do you know what will be the immediate practical effect, the recognised consequence to all here present?' 'Ah, tell us,' said Condorcet, with his insolent and half-suppressed smile, 'a philosopher is not sorry to encounter a prophet.' 'For you, Monsieur de Condorcet, you will die wretched on the floor of a dungeon; you will die of the poison that you will take in order to avoid the block, of the poison which the happiness of that time will oblige you to carry about with you.' At first much surprise was exhibited, but they presently recollected that the good Cazotte was subject to waking dreams, and they laughed heartily. 'Monsieur Cazotte, the tale that you have told is not so agreeable as your Diable Amoureux' (a novel of Cazotte's). 'But what devil has put the dungeon and poison and execution into your head? What can that have to do with philosophy and the reign of reason?' 'That is exactly what I am telling you; it is in the name of philosophy, of humanity and liberty, and under the reign of reason that you will thus end your career, and well may it be called the reign of reason, for she will then occupy all the churches, and there will not then be in all France any other temples than those dedicated to the Goddess of Reason.' 'By my faith,' said Chamfort, with a sarcastic laugh, 'you will not be a priest in those temples.' 'I hope not; but you, Monsieur de Chamfort, who will be one, and a most worthy one, will open your veins with twenty-two razor cuts, and yet you will not die for some months afterwards.' They looked at each other and laughed again. 'You, Monsieur Vieu d'Azyar, will not open your own veins, but you will have them opened six times in one day, in an attack of the gout, in order to be sure of your end, and you will die in the night. You, Monsieur de Nicolai, will die on the scaffold; you, Monsieur Bailly, on the scaffold; you, Monsieur de Malesherbes, on the scaffold.' 'Ah, Heaven be thanked!' said Roucher; 'this gentleman, it seems, only wants the Academicians, he has made a great slaughter; and myself, for mercy's sake?' 'You? You will also die on the scaffold.' 'Oh! what a guesser; he has sworn to exterminate all of us.' 'No, it is not I who have sworn.' 'But shall we then be conquered by Tartars and Turks?' 'No, not at all. I have already told you, you will be governed by philosophy and reason alone. Those who will thus treat you will all be philosophers; will have at the time on their tongues the same phrases that you have uttered during the last hour; will repeat all your maxims, and, like you, will recite the verses of Diderot and La Pucelle.' Everybody was whispering, 'You see he is mad,' for he was perfectly serious and solemn. 'It is easy to see that he is joking, and he always introduces the marvellous into his jests.' 'Yes,' replied Chamfort, 'but his marvellousness is not gay; it savours too much of the gibbet. But when is all this to happen?' 'Six years will not have passed, before all I have said will be accomplished.' 'You talk of miracles, (and now it was I who spoke), 'but you have not included me in your list.' 'You will then be a miracle, no less wonderful, for you will then be a Christian.' At this there were many exclamations of surprise. 'Ah, (said Chamfort), 'I am relieved. If we shall only perish when La Harpe becomes a Christian we shall be immortal.' 'As for us,' then said Madame la Duchesse de Grammont, 'women are very happy to rank for nothing in revolutions. When I say for nothing I do not mean to say that we do not meddle a little, but our sex is exempt.' 'Your sex, ladies, will not save you this time; you had better meddle with nothing, for you will be treated as men, without the least difference.' 'But what do you mean, Monsieur Cazotte? You are preaching to us the end of the world.' 'I know nothing about that, but what I do know is that you, Madame la Duchesse, will be taken to the scaffold, you and many other ladies with you, in the executioner's cart with your hands tied behind your back.' 'Ah, I hope in that case I shall, at least, have a carriage hung with black.' 'No, madame; ladies of higher rank than yourself will, like you, go in a cart with their hands bound behind them.' 'Of higher rank? What! princesses of the blood?' 'Of still higher rank!' At this the company began to be agitated, and the brow of the host grew dark and lowering. All began to feel that the joke grew serious. In order to dispel the cloud Madame de Grammont, instead of noticing this reply, said in a lively tone, 'You see he will not even let me have a confessor.' 'No, madame; neither you nor any one else will have one. The last of the condemned who will have one, as a special favour, will be——' he hesitated. 'Well, who is the happy mortal who will enjoy this prerogative?' 'It is the last that will remain to him—it will be the King of France.' The master of the house hurriedly arose, and all was confusion. Approaching M. Cazotte, he said to him impressively: 'My dear Monsieur Cazotte, we have had enough of this mournful farce. You carry it too far, and will not only compromise yourself but the whole company.' Cazotte made no reply, but preferred to depart, when Madame de Grammont, who was always merry, turned towards him and said: 'Sir Prophet, you have told us all our good fortunes, but you have said nothing of your own.' He mused for some time with his eyes cast down. 'Madame, have you read "The Siege of Jerusalem" in Josephus?' 'Oh, certainly, who has not? But tell me as though I had not read it.' 'Well, madame, during the siege there was a man who, for seven days and nights, walked the ramparts incessantly, in the sight of besieged and besiegers, shouting in a sad and loud voice: "Woe to Jerusalem!" "Woe to myself!" at which moment an enormous stone cast by the enemies' machines struck him and crushed him to death.' On saying this Cazotte bowed and retired.
Serrer le cou du dernier roi,'

* La Harpe, who died in 1803, was forty-nine years of age, and an ardent Robespierian Republican when this prophecy was uttered. The prophecy of Cazotte was attested not only by La Harpe but by Madame Genlis, the Countess Beauharnais, and others.

* In the single case known to me where an apparition was weighed its weight agreed with that of the medium (Ps. St. VIII., 52), from which it is to be concluded that it was the medium himself who stepped upon the scale.

These predictions were wonderfully fulfilled. La Harpe, from being a supporter of Robespierre, became disgusted with the revolution and adopted religious views. Bailly was executed in their usual savage style by the Jacobins, November 11th, 1793. His profound scientific and historic writings, and his eminent services as Mayor of Paris and as President of the National Assembly, inspired no mercy in the savages. The learned and exemplary Malesherbes was arrested in December, 1793, and executed April 22nd, 1794. Thus both met their fate within the six years allowed by Cazotte. Of Chamfort, the brilliant wit and furious revolutionist, Chambers' Cyclopaedia says that he died in 1794 (within the six years of Cazotte). He had been once arrested for his reckless expressions, and being threatened with a second arrest, he attempted suicide with pistol and poignard, and shockingly hacked and shattered, dictated to those who came to arrest him the well-known declaration: "I, Sebastian Roch Nicholas Chamfort, declare that I would sooner suffer death as a freeman than be conducted as a slave to prison." He did not die immediately, but lingered awhile in the charge of a gendarme. Roucher was put to death August 7th, 1794, Cazotte was executed September 25th, 1792, and Vicq d'Azyr died June 29th, 1794.

Professor Gregory says: "When for the first time I read this astonishing prediction, I thought that it was only a fiction of La Harpe's, and that that celebrated critic wished to depict the astonishment which would have seized persons distinguished for their rank, their talents, and their future, if several years before the Revolution one could have brought before them the causes which were preparing, and the frightful consequences which would follow. The inquiries which I have since made, and the information I have gained have induced me to change my opinion. M. le Comte A. de

Montesquieu, having assured me that Madame de Genlis had repeatedly told him that she had often heard this prediction related by M. de la Harpe, I begged of him to have the goodness to solicit from that lady more ample details. This is her reply: 'November, 1825.—I think I have somewhere placed among my souvenirs the anecdote of M. Cazotte, but I am not sure. I have heard it related a hundred times by M. de la Harpe, before the Revolution, and always in the same form as I have met with it in print, and as he himself has caused it to be printed. This is all that I can say or certify, or authenticate by my signature.—COUNTESS DE GENLIS.' I have also seen the son of M. Cazotte, who assured me that his father was gifted in a most remarkable manner with a faculty of prevision, of which he had numberless proofs; one of the most remarkable of which was that, on returning home on the day on which his daughter had succeeded in delivering him from the hands of the wretches who were conducting him to the scaffold, instead of partaking of the joy of his surrounding family, he declared that in three days he should be again arrested, and that he should then undergo his fate; and in truth he perished on the 25th of September, 1792, at the age of seventy-two. In reference to the above narrative, M. Cazotte, jun., would not undertake to affirm that the relation of La Harpe was exact in all its expressions, but had not the smallest doubt as to the reality of the facts. I ought to add that a friend of Vicq d'Azyr, an inhabitant of Vannes, told me that that celebrated physician, having travelled into Brittany some years before the Revolution, had related to him, before his family, the prophecy of Cazotte. It seemed that, notwithstanding his scepticism, Vicq d'Azyr was uneasy about this prediction. A letter on this subject from Baron Delamotte Langon, addressed to M. Mialle, gives additional confirmation as follows: 'You inquire of me, my dear friend, what I know concerning the famous prediction of Cazotte mentioned by La Harpe. I have heard Madame la Comtesse de Beaularnais many times assert that she was present at this very singular historical fact. She related it always in the same way, and with the accent of truth; her evidence is fully corroborated by that of La Harpe. She spoke thus, before all the persons of the society in which she moved, many of whom still live, and could equally attest this assertion. You may make what use you please with this communication. Adieu, my good old friend. I remain, with inviolable attachment, yours, BARON DELAMOTTE LANGON.'

"POLTERGEIST" disturbances, with stone and coal throwing, are reported in a letter copied from the Hamburg Reform of 11th July, 1885, as recently occurring in a house at Wismar, Mecklenburg. The fact that there was the inevitable servant-girl who is said to have "confessed" will certainly not dispose of the question for any one who is familiar with the history of similar cases. But as the circumstances are not described with sufficient detail for any confident judgment to be pronounced, the account is reserved here till the further information and sequel asked for by Psychische Studien are, perhaps, forthcoming.

SPIRITUALISM AND RELIGIOUS INTOLERANCE.—The Religio-Philosophical Journal has a long article thus headed, by John Edwards, here condensed: "Bishop Foster advocates free discussion in spiritual subjects. This is claimed from the religious world for Spiritualism, now forty years in existence, with an ever-growing number of adherents. Spiritualism is passing through the same ordeal of opposition as Methodism did in its early time. John Wesley was opposed by Calvinists for less exclusive Armenian doctrine. The doctrines of John Calvin engendered hard, cruel intolerance. Michael Servetus, by his Unitarian writings, excited such sectarian anger in the mind of Calvin, that he contrived to have him burnt as a heretic. Calvinism, thus inaugurated, maintained its persecuting spirit against the holders of other forms of belief, the Quakers for example, culminating in that of the unhappy mediums called 'witches.' That it is still moved by the same spirit of persecution, witness the utterances of its preachers against Spiritualists. Burning faggots are out of date, but they burn them in thought and words. The text-books of Calvinism teach that God's justice is shown in the condemnation of the majority of His creatures, including infants, to a material flaming hell. The Universalists and Unitarians have met this doctrine by teaching that their hell is a misnomer of the terms School and Hades; they have swept the minds of many clear of the doctrines of election and reprobation; and they have preached, in the place of an almost universal damnation, universal salvation; this they have done with effect, for Calvinistic pulpit preachings are now not up to the mark of their text-books. It remains for the whole of their hard, cruel doctrines to disappear in the light of Spiritualism, which exhibits the law of unfolding progress in the grand future of spiritual existence."

PHASES OF MATERIALIZATION.

A CHAPTER OF RESEARCH

IN THE

OBJECTIVE PHENOMENA OF SPIRITUALISM.

By "M. A. (OXON.)"

Before I take up once more the course of my argument, which illness and other causes have so often interrupted, and which my late accident and its untoward consequences broke rudely off in November last, it may be convenient to put before my readers some account of what has been done and what remains yet for me to do. The subject, I need not now say, is one of infinite complexity; the evidence a bulky and unmanageable mass. Moreover, every week adds to its size, and makes it impossible to deal with any but a comparatively small proportion of it. It has long been plain to me that I cannot hope to do more than introduce some orderly system into what is now a chaotic mass of evidence of very unequal value. The time is not yet come for any perfectly satisfactory treatment of this perplexing subject.

So far as I had proceeded in my argument in these columns between January 1st and November 1st, 1884, I had dealt with

It remains for me to complete the scheme roughly put down in "LIGHT" (September 13th, 1884). Though I have been, as I anticipated, forced to make some alterations, it remains substantially true as an indication of my general method of treatment.

When this has been done I shall proceed to give some detailed account of phenomena which have occurred in the presence of a selected medium during a course of years. It has seemed to me that analytical classification of cases, though in some ways impressive and valuable as a means of presenting evidence, is not by itself wholly satisfactory. I shall strengthen the case so presented by treating in some detail of phenomena that have presented themselves during a group of years through the mediumship of a single individual.

When this has been done my work will be within measurable distance of completion. Whether I shall feel myself able to throw any light on theories, to discuss explanations and difficulties with advantage, or whether I shall think that the time has not come for any useful attempt of the kind, I do not venture to predict, because I do not happen to know. Explanations that explain nothing, and discussions that begin and end in mist and fog, do not commend themselves to my mind. If, as is very probable, I know no more about the mysteries of materialization a year hence than I did when I began to deal with them more than ten years ago, I will confess my ignorance with all frankness, and decline to take up space that might be better occupied. Whether I can or cannot frame a reasonable explanation of the methods by which these astounding phenomena are produced, I believe I shall have presented such a compact and coherent body of evidence for their reality as no honest and impartial mind can disregard.

THE way to make men and women better is not to tell them how bad they are, but how good they can be.—FLETCHER.

THE man who, claiming to be scientific and to know all the laws of nature thoroughly, and who declares clairvoyance and direct writing to transcend the boundaries of scientific investigation, is himself under hallucination more serious than any which he affects to deplore.—EPES SARGENT.

The W— Seances.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—In the course of Mr. Farmer's exceedingly interesting letter in "LIGHT" of September 19th, appears a challenge to certain members of the private circle who sat at W—, to publish a report of the manifestations which occurred there.

Remarks have reached him as made, not by one of ourselves, but by an anonymous person, which seem to reflect upon his bona fides with regard to what took place at W—; and he is desirous, with an honourable instinct which has our utmost sympathy, that the facts should be presented to the judgment of the Spiritualistic world.

Now the person who made the remarks to which objection has been taken by Mr. Farmer has explained in the letter which you publish that he made them in a sense by no means reflecting on Mr. Farmer's probity or competency as a witness. We are most anxious publicly to state that there is not one jot or tittle of evidence known to any one of us which casts any sinister reflection whatsoever upon Mr. Farmer's good faith, or that of Mr. Eglinton.

Having made this plain statement of our opinion as to the parts played by Messrs. Farmer and Eglinton at the seances above alluded to, we do not think it necessary to occupy your valuable space by any discussion of the question as to the general credibility of Spiritualists as witnesses. Nothing but the most general conclusions could be arrived at as to the moral and mental characteristics of so many persons.

In conclusion we beg to state that our report of the proceedings at W— is at present incomplete; but that so soon as the various amendments suggested by the different members of the party shall have been incorporated in the report, we hope to take steps for its publication.—We are, sir, your obedient servants,

THE MEMBERS OF THE PRIVATE CIRCLE AT W—.

The Society for Psychical Research.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—It is matter for deep regret that a spirit of factious egotism has been let loose among Spiritualists. Neither the Materialist nor the Spiritualist has the right to say that he alone possesses the truth; and for the latter to say so is to commit the crime of which he habitually accuses the former.

The Society for Psychical Research has done most excellent work. In the face of ridicule the most pronounced, and hatred the most palpable, it has succeeded in forcing on the world an acknowledgment of Spiritualistic facts which that world had determined to ignore. We owe it to this Society that we are no longer discussing phenomena, but the causes of those phenomena—their existence is now admitted, their meaning alone is in dispute.

Telepathy, undoubtedly, does not cover all the ground, but we have no reason to suppose that men who have so bravely borne the scorn of their fellows, will hesitate to acknowledge the errors into which their theory may have led them, when the time comes for them to do so.

The Society for Psychical Research, of which Messrs. Myers and Gurney are the indefatigable literary exponents, deserves well of Spiritualists, and no good can be done by such attacks as those of Mr. Haughton, who arrogates to himself a knowledge of time and space which is little less than omniscient.—Faithfully yours,

October 5th, 1885.

Where Are We Drifting?

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—We are often told that the educated classes are rapidly drifting into a pessimistic materialism, and the following extract from a letter written by a brother in Australasia to a sister in England, strongly confirms the assertion. I fail to discover any method of meeting the doubts and difficulties contained in the following extract, and which obtain in the minds of hundreds of thousands of the best men and women on earth, than in the full and honest investigation of the despised phenomena of Modern Spiritualism. Pulpit platitudes and old-world theories are valueless in the face of the evolutionary physics of the present day. The extract is as follows:—

"Sunday Afternoon, 26th July, 1885.

"It is a dull, over-clouded day, offering not much temptation to leave the desk and the warm fireside. I have been at home all the morning, writing letters and reading Reade's 'Martyrdom of Man.' This book is a shallow thing and jerky in style, as compared with 'Draper's Conflict.' It is a sort of universal history, written to show how man has advanced through hardship, war, slavery, and religious error to his present stage of civilised advancement and intellectual tolerance. It is a kind of boiled-down mass of historical information, strongly flavoured with Pantheistic materialism, but not without a good deal of interest. It is well worth a single reading in conjunction with such books as 'Draper's Conflicts' and 'Greig's Creed of Christendom.' The more I learn of the progress of nature and humanity, the more amazed am I at the curious blindness of the Church and her teachers. But, then, when I come to study individual men and women—those who have not cultivated their intellectual faculties—I can see a glimmer of reasonableness in religious superstition.

"How hopeless would the lives of many appear if they were suddenly to realise that this life is the only one for them as individuals, that they are only fleeting atoms in the growth of the race, that the race itself is but an incident in the growth of the universe—that Heaven, Hell, Christ's Divinity, and the Atonement, are only temporary and useful fictions. Such a realisation of a hard and stern truth can only come to those who are gradually prepared for it, and are therefore able to face it with equanimity. We must, therefore, not be impatient of what we think to be untruths. Write me regularly, and believe me ever, &c., &c."

The above is a type of the thoughts which flit through or are fixed in the minds of the majority of studious young men, and the only real key to the castle of doubt and unbelief is in the possession of Modern Spiritualism.—I am, &c.,

Newcastle-on-Tyne, October 4th, 1885. T. P. BARKAS.

Mr. Haughton and Mr. Myers.
To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—The controversy between Mr. Haughton and Mr. Myers, which appeared in the August number of the Journal of the Society for Psychical Research, having flowed over into your columns, I ask the favour of your inserting a reply I have sent for insertion in the Journal of the Society.—I am, yours truly, T. P. BARKAS.

"TO THE EDITOR OF THE Journal of the Society for Psychical Research."

"SIR,—In your Journal for August, 1885, I observe two communications, one from Mr. G. D. Haughton, to which is a reply by Mr. Myers; in the former is a paragraph referring to experiments conducted by myself, and in the latter are remarks on Mr. Haughton's suggestions. As the remarks in each case are brief, I quote them, and ask your permission to reply to the observations of Mr. Myers.

"Mr. G. D. Haughton says, p. 28: 'There is, however, quite enough to interest and engage them at home, if their hearts are in the cause. Why do they not investigate the case of Mr. Barkas, of Newcastle? He is a credible witness—the people of Newcastle know him well; his antecedents would satisfy even Mr. Davies. Now I want to know why the Barkas case, and the source of the replies made by an indifferently educated person to the abstract questions propounded, as recorded in the columns of "LIGHT," is not thoroughly and exhaustively examined. I suspect that a similar motive rules here as in the Eglinton case. Is it not, at all events, apparent that the Society is evading difficulties, not meeting them?'

"To which Mr. Myers replied, p. 31:—

"The automatic writing of an indifferently educated person (otherwise known as Mrs. Esperance), said to be inspired by Humnour Stafford, and recorded by Mr. Barkas.

"I have known Mr. Barkas since January, 1875, and through his introduction sat with this medium on October 16th, 17th, and 18th, 1875. I have also studied all her printed answers.

"I consider the case curious and interesting, and I am not surprised at Mr. Barkas' view of it, but unfortunately the gross want of comprehension of the subjects inquired about, and the palpable blunders which the replies contain seem to me to preclude us from regarding them as affording evidence of the guidance of a scientific spirit.

"The fact, moreover, that the same medium, under the name of Mrs. Esperance, was afterwards detected in personating a materialised spirit, tended to discourage me from seeking further evidence through that channel."

"I desire very briefly to reply to the unintentionally unfair and illogical criticisms of Mr. Myers.

"The first has reference to the alleged 'palpable blunders' in the written communications, and the second to the alleged detection of the medium 'in personating a materialised spirit.'"

"I simply wish to say, in reference to the last charge, that intelligent and experienced investigators who were at the séance when the supposed detection took place deny the assertion utterly, and I personally affirm that if the alleged personation really occurred, it is not beyond experience that it took place automatically and unconsciously so far as regards the medium. I was not present at the séance, and cannot speak from personal observation; but if outsiders are to put the worst construction upon all reported occurrences in this world, few will pass unscathed.

"Passing from this very doubtful alleged exposure, I now proceed to consider Mr. Myers' criticism of séances at which I was present, and verbatim records of which I have preserved.

"Mr. Myers says: 'Unfortunately, the gross want of comprehension of the subjects inquired about, and the palpable blunders which the replies contain, seem to me to preclude us from regarding the case as affording evidence of the guidance of a scientific spirit.'"

"There are two methods of testing the accuracy of the inferences deduced by Mr. Myers, from his as yet limited knowledge of the facts.

"He asserts that the answers indicate a want of comprehension of the subjects, and that the erroneousness of some of the replies precludes us from regarding them as being dictated by a scientific spirit.

"All comprehension is relative. No human being, either in or out of the flesh, fully comprehends any subject, and imperfection, therefore, may be looked for in the opinions of all.

"Mr. Myers will find, on referring to 'LIGHT' of February 21st, 1885, that his recognition of erroneous replies is not original. I there point out the fact of the occurrence of errors, and had Mr. Myers been more familiar with the investigation, he might have known that I devoted an evening to the correction of the supposed errors, with and by Humnour Stafford himself.

"I would remind Mr. Myers that books carefully written, revised, and printed by eminent scientific men on their own specialities are not free from error. If he doubt this, I shall have pleasure, when next he visits Newcastle, in showing him a book written by one of the most eminent scientific men now in the world, in which there are records of many alleged original discoveries, and many alleged new genera named and figured, not one of which is new, and not one of which is correct. Did this learned scientist not write the book? Mr. Myers, to carry out his theory as applied to the unpremeditated replies of Humnour Stafford, should answer, 'No!' and he would be as likely to be right in the one case as in the other.

"I shall be glad to submit the questions I asked through the uneducated lady medium to any learned member of the Society for Psychical Research, or to any man or woman whom they may nominate; and I venture to affirm that he or she will not be able to answer them so quickly and correctly as they were answered by the hand of a very partially educated woman. Of course, I expect the answerer to cover the entire field, and not confine himself or herself to a portion of the questions only.—I am, yours truly,

"Newcastle-on-Tyne, October 3rd, 1885. T. P. BARKAS."

Automatic Writing.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—A simple account of my experience in developing the power of automatic writing may be of use in encouraging others who, like myself, have had long to wait for what they earnestly hope for. It is now fifteen months since I became convinced of the truth of Spiritualism by means of the phenomenon of slate-writing. At my first séance I was informed in writing that I was highly mediumistic, and, when I inquired in what way, I was told, besides other phrases which I need not mention, that of "writing." I accordingly sat regularly with a psychograph, which I procured in the hope that the power would shortly be developed, but weeks and months passed by without any sign of it, and had I not in the meantime developed another phase of mediumship, I should have been very discouraged. I had sat for six months in this way, always alone, when I began occasionally to get marks with the psychograph, but never anything that could possibly be construed into a word or even a letter, and I think I should have given it up in despair, had I not always been encouraged by the guides of Mr. Eglinton, with whom I had occasional séances for direct writing, to persevere. On one occasion was written, "You are developing, but we cannot tell when results will come." I have recently been spending six weeks in Switzerland, and it was during the fourth week of my stay there that the power of automatic writing first came to me, quite unexpectedly, just thirteen months after I began to sit for

"FACTS."

The monthly magazine bearing this title, published at the Danvers Light Office, and of which the eighth number of the fourth volume is just received, was originated by Mr. Whitlock for the simple registration of "mental and spiritual phenomena," leaving the work of reasoning, or speculating and theorising upon them to readers. The present number contains as striking records as any of the preceding ones. Some names of mediums are new to us: American Spiritualist papers all say that new mediums are being everywhere developed.

The editor, Mr. Whitlock, arranged a Facts Convention at Onset Bay Camp Meeting this year, at which séances were arranged, under test conditions, for the presentation of phenomena to be published in Facts. One of these séances is reported by Mrs. Baylis, of Billingsby, with Mrs. Beste as medium. From this report it appears that at the séance of Sunday evening, July 19th, after the circle had been formed, the medium requested that the gentlemen should withdraw. When the ladies were left alone with her she desired, to strengthen the tests, that her own dress might be substituted by one furnished by some lady present. Mrs. Baylis went for one of her own—a morning gown, which Mrs. Beste put on after taking off every particle of her own clothing except her stockings.

On the reconstitution of the circle and extinction of the light, various phenomena occurred; spirit friends came to several of the circle, giving proofs of their identity. There was fine and varied singing by spirit voices. A beautiful female figure came forth from the cabinet in voluminous, translucent, resplendent drapery, its folds ending in a graceful train.

On this spirit withdrawing, a male spirit appeared whom Mrs. Baylis saw near Onset, at Mrs. Beste's séances, last year, calling himself Apollonius: he is of majestic form and presence; his robe, with large depending sleeves, was resplendent with light like moonlight. At request he laid his large hand upon the heads of those present, and uttered words of blessing in a strong sonorous voice.

"These séances are declared to be directed by ancient spirits," Mrs. Baylis says, "for the evolution of voice and power to use our language, in order to instruct the people in the ways and progress of spiritual development, and the laws governing the conditions and return of those who have passed from earth life; also to prepare the world for the change involved in the coming epoch of extended spirit-power. There is certainly a marked increase in the power of the spirits manifesting themselves here since last year. The ancient ones come more easily, remain longer, and talk more freely. Correspondingly, personal spirit-friends stay out of the cabinet longer, seem stronger, and converse with more freedom."

Another manifestation by materialisation, with Miss Helen Berry as medium, is reported by Mrs. Stiles, of Worcester, Mass. The report says: "My daughter Effie, now in the spirit-world, came out of the cabinet beautifully materialised, knelt at my feet, and caressed me in her old way; then she crossed over to where a dear friend sat and talked with her; returning to me she took from my hand a bracelet which she used to wear, and clasping it upon her wrist, said 'When the medium is brought out try it on hers.' Subsequently the spirit Tecumseh did bring the medium out of the cabinet entranced; he motioned to me to approach, and then asked me to try on the bracelet; I did so, but it did not meet by a quarter of an inch. While Tecumseh stood there supporting the medium, another spirit came out, and stood beside them, forming a wonderful tableau."

The following proof of spirit identity is reported by S. E. Hervey, M.D., Brooklyn, N.Y.: "When I was in Leadville, Col., four years ago, I lent my rooms to Miss Emma Bolyme, trance speaker and psychometrist, for a reception. Among those present was a physician of the locality, not a Spiritualist, whom a friend had invited to accompany him. Towards the close of the séance, the sceptical doctor placed a small packet in the medium's hand. She passed under control and said: 'In this is something of mine while I was in the body. Tell my brother that I fell into the shaft-hole; I hurt my spine; I was so numbed that I could not move, and passed to the spirit-life. But I am here now. The spirit gave his name and said he reported for the Leadville Herald. The manifestation was conclusive with the doctor who brought the packet.'

It. I was reading a German book one morning in my own room, and had a pencil in my hand to mark any words I might afterwards wish to look out in the dictionary, when a slight and peculiar sensation seemed to run down my fingers and the pencil began to move. I allowed it to run over the book in what appeared to be attempts at letters, and afterwards got a sheet of paper, over which the pencil in my hand traced all sorts of hieroglyphics, the only readable word of which was "try." I was moving about for some days after this, and it was only about a week later—on September 1st—when I had settled down again, that I got my first actual communication in legible writing. I only got a few words at a time, and then the intimation to "leave off," sometimes finishing with "God bless you," and always signed with the initial of the friend from whom I have received many letters (generally written on note-paper) through Mr. Eglinton's mediumship. On returning to England I was advised, while the power continued so weak, only to sit twice a week for writing, and my guide never allows me to sit longer than half-an-hour at a time, the writing sometimes not commencing for a quarter of an hour, at other times after a minute or two. One incident connected with these communications may, I think, be of interest to others. Last Sunday, when I commenced, I thought (though I had no moral doubt whatever of the identity of my correspondent) that it would be satisfactory to have some undeniable proof. I therefore asked a question, to explain which I must refer to a letter I received from my friend last October, in direct writing on paper, through Mr. Eglinton's mediumship. In this letter my friend referred to a place in Germany with a very singular name, which I then recalled he had told me some years before he had once stayed at. The remembrance of the conversation, which was of no importance, had quite passed from my mind, till I read the name of the place written, which I remembered distinctly from its singularity. I have never heard it before or since. I therefore asked him on Sunday if he remembered this incident and whether, if the power were strong enough, he could tell me where this place was. When the pencil began to write, to my great astonishment the word written was "Dresden," and when I asked if he meant the place was near Dresden, "Yes" was written. I now began to remember dimly that he had said something to that effect in the conversation to which I allude, though, as I said before, it had passed so completely from my memory that I had never cast a thought upon it again. This communication was signed with his Christian and surname in full. The word I had expected to be written was that of some country, such as Austria or Bohemia, and this test was the more satisfactory to me, not so much as a proof of identity, as showing that the writing did not proceed in any way from my own mind, being indeed directly contrary to what I anticipated. I subjoin my name and address not for publication, though they are already well-known to you. I only wish to say that for the future I intend, instead of using the signature of M.B. (my actual initials) which I have appended to several short articles appearing in "LIGHT," to make use of that of "V." for the reason I mentioned when I last met you.—Believe me, dear sir, yours faithfully,

OMENS.

That with great men, who more than others are in intimate spiritual connection with public events, there occur certain presentiments and omens of things happening or impending, is exemplified in the following incident from Goethe's life. Goethe did not conceal his admiration for Napoleon I., and in the house at Weimar where he lived and died are to be seen several statuettes of Napoleon. On the wall of the study hangs a plaster medallion portrait of the latter, with the inscription in red "Vestigium immenso superest ex nomine multum." From the edge a bit has been knocked off, and this happened when, during the battle at Leipzig, this medallion fell from the wall without apparent cause. . . . It would be interesting to ascertain the exact time of the fall, with reference to the suggestion that Napoleon's spirit, in sympathetic connection with Goethe's, announced to the latter the moment when, with inward terror, the loss of the battle and downfall of dominion were apprehended, this excitement being imparted sympathetically by an explosive agitation of the ether, which with Goethe effected the disjunction of the medallion from the nail. To the same category belong the sudden stopping of watches and other signs with dying persons. "Are we not," adds Herr Wittig, "in an unconscious soulful connection with all things, so that we may sometimes be able, statutorially or mediumistically, to act immediately on their force principles?"—Psychische Studien XI., 586-7 (December, 1884.)

THE POLYTECHNIC AND SPIRITUALISM.

Home Tidings has an article of five or six columns, continued through several numbers, headed "Ghosts." It contains the "Report of a Committee for inquiring into Phenomena called Spiritual."

In July last, it seems, "the intellectual world of the Polytechnic was startled by a rumour that séances were held near by, at which spirit forms appeared," and that it therefore became the duty of all truthseekers to investigate, &c. A committee was appointed, the members of it being J. Bancroft, of the elocution class; W. Hasluck, W. A. Jackaman, and S. A. Cross, secretary and reporter.

The committee decided to attend the séances, and report. "We hope," says the report, "there is nothing in it to offend the susceptibilities of Spiritualists, for we believe there is much in 'psychical phenomena' not to be accounted for by any known laws."

This beginning, thought we, promises well.

But, before following the representatives of the intellectual world of the Polytechnic and its secretary, who believes "there is much in 'psychical phenomena' not to be accounted for by any known laws," let us take a glance backward for some years.

After "Professor" Anderson was found not to have succeeded in conjuring away Spiritualism, as he told his audiences he had done, the directors of the old Polytechnic took the business in hand scientifically, and "Professor" Pepper showed to hand-clapping audiences that ghosts could be produced to order; and it was said that all were disposed of except Pepper's ghosts, and for his success his directors gave him a bonus out of the profits of his "ghost."

But a few more years passed and our Polytechnic directors found that Pepper's demonstrations were not final, and that Spiritualism was not dead. Then they set their lecturer, Mr. King, to the work of "slaying the thrice slain." So with his electric hammers to make "raps" and wires to do "levitations," and other pieces of ingenuity, with a lady supernumerary as a medium, the Polytechnic séances were advertised. But they did not become, as the directors had hoped, so celebrated as to finally efface Spiritualism.

After a time effacement befel the Polytechnic itself. Its name, however, is revived under very serious auspices, and the new institute was started with classes for the study of all subjects except psychical. Here we may take up the report of the secretary. It tells us that the committee started at 6 p.m., Mr. Jackaman having added to his usual gay and festive appearance a pair of classic eyeglasses; Mr. Hasluck armed with a life-preserving apparatus for protection against over-demonstrative spirits; Mr. Bancroft could not come, being engaged in slaughtering some ideal foes—he is the elocutionist—"and having done his slaughtering somewhat amiss he wished to fire some more rounds."

"We found," the report goes on, "that the circle met in the back parlour of a little newspaper shop lighted with a tallow dip, the flickering of which had to suffer ignominious extinction, for in the course of our séance the tallow dip, placed on the floor behind an old tin tray, set fire to the wall-paper and the coat-tails of the chairman of the circle, to the great disgust of the gigantic clairvoyant."

But enough: we stop here and ask if our readers can kindly forgive us for having exhibited so much of the light of the "intellectual world of the Polytechnic." Such light as this is brought to shine through more than five columns of Home Tidings. The exhibitor of the light is, perhaps, regarded as witty by his class, maybe by the benefactor of the institute itself. In this—may we say?—witty style does the secretary write of what the "committee of inquiry" was, but not anything do we learn of what they said.

Are the readers of Home Tidings to have more "edification" by this sort of "inquiry"? It seems so by a concluding notice, which says: "The Spiritual Inquiry Committee having dissolved itself, it has now been constituted as a General Investigation Committee, and will henceforth confine itself to the investigation of things material. It having reached our ears that strange things have occurred in the French capital, G. A. Mead, a member of the committee, together with W. D. Hasluck, have been appointed as an expedition to proceed to Paris and personally inquire into them. On their return a report will be drawn up for Home Tidings."

If this announced report is for the true edification of readers, the reporter will confine himself to simply stating facts, the missionary investigators keeping in mind that they who seek the truth should not do so, except in the spirit of truth.

MR. EGLINTON has had some successful séances at Bolton-le-Moor, where he has been staying for a few days.

MISS FLORENCE MARRYAT (Mrs. Lean) has purchased and edits the weekly journal Good Goods: Once a Week. We believe it is her intention to narrate some of her marvellous experiences in Spiritualism—extending over twenty years—in its columns.

THE LONDON SPIRITUALIST ALLIANCE.—At the last meeting of the Council of the London Spiritualist Alliance, a resolution was passed that members joining after the 1st October should, on payment of their subscriptions, be entitled to membership from the date of payment to the end of 1886.

MESSRS. LONGMAN, GREEN AND Co. announce a new book on "Fishing," by Mr. H. Cholmondeley Pennell, late H.M. Inspector of Sea Fisheries, and Director General of Commerce, Egypt. This gentleman, it will be recollected, published in these columns about a year ago a series of very remarkable séances with Mr. W. Eglinton.

MATERIALISATION ON BOARD SHIP.—Great interest in Spiritualist phenomena is now being manifested at Newport, Rhode Island, from the publication of a séance on board a schooner, with Mrs. Rebecca Wright, a recently-developed medium, who receives no remuneration. The schooner belongs to Captain Dayton, who writes:—"One of the cabins was used as a cabinet. Twenty-five forms appeared one after another—children and adults. One was the brother of one of the circle; then his mother appeared, and talked with him in German, of which the medium knows nothing. The familiar guide of the medium, 'Sunshine,' danced to the music of her own tambourine. Theresa, a sister of mercy, under whose control Mrs. Wright has been developed, came in the dress of her order. My half-sister, Mary, whom I have seen materialised at séances with other mediums, appeared, and sang 'Home, Sweet Home'; she expressed her pleasure at being able to materialise herself on board her father's ship."—Banner of Light.

RECORDS OF PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

[In this column will be given from time to time such accounts of psychical phenomena as seem to be worthy of permanent record. Beyond the general classification indicated, no attempt at tabulation will at present be made; that work will follow in due course. In furtherance of this object we shall be pleased to receive from our readers brief reports of phenomena subject to two conditions. (1) That a colourless statement of facts without comment is given; and (2) that communications are accompanied by the names and addresses of those concerned, not necessarily for publication, though we should naturally prefer to be at liberty to publish them. Amongst the phenomena referred to may be mentioned:—

CLASS L.—FORM MANIFESTATIONS.

[The following account of a form manifestation with the medium in full view is valuable as an instalment of evidence towards this remarkable phenomenon. By far the most complete account of what occurs at such times was published in "LIGHT" for February 28th last, when the light allowed for observation was good. In the present instance Mr. Wedgwood, who is somewhat advanced in years, was unable to see very clearly. Fortunately the other witnesses were not so affected, and their testimony is very valuable as corroborative of the published experience of about fifty other witnesses to this especial phenomenon.]

On the 22nd September, I, Hensleigh Wedgwood, had a sitting for materialisation with Mr. Eglinton, in company with Miss Symons, Mrs. Lewis, and Miss Nina Corner. The cabinet was an empty dressing-room adjoining the room in which we sat. It was thoroughly searched before we sat down, and the door opening on the stairs secured by gummed paper, initialed by the ladies. This was found intact after the conclusion of the séance.

We sat in a row facing the entrance into the cabinet. Mr. Eglinton turned down the gas to a low light, and shortly afterwards began to walk up and down, when I observed, never having seen anything like it before, a light, not looking phosphorescent, but of the brightness of flame, which appeared for a moment every now and then on his left side, outside his clothes. Miss Symons, who has very good eyes, saw it much more frequently than I did, and compared it to an electric light. She says: "As he paced up and down the room we all saw a very bright electric-like light emanating from his left side. This light came and went for some time, occasionally increasing and decreasing in intensity." After a while Mr. Eglinton went into the cabinet, and almost immediately a white, cloudy figure began to form on our side of the curtains which closed the entrance. This figure speedily grew into the form of an Arab in white drapery who came forward and satisfied everybody, by the grasp of his hand, of his solidity and living warmth.

After him came a female of swarthy complexion (as I judged by comparing the colour of her face with that of the lady sitting next me), and then the first figure returned, who, as I now perceived, had a turban and a bushy beard, which he made to brush against my face. The female, who claimed to be Dew Drop, a well-known control of Mrs. Fletcher, was dressed in much more abundant drapery, which she seemed to be constantly drawing out with both her hands and throwing towards us as she came forwards. It was after the second appearance of the Arab, I think, that Mr. Eglinton came out and lowered the gas to a very feeble light, but not, I think, quite to the blue. After this we heard him come stamping out of the cabinet again, when he seemed to stop opposite Miss Corner, but my sight being very imperfect in a low light I could not see him in his black clothes, though I knew where he was;

and presently I saw dimly a low white mass, which grew into a white figure as tall as himself, sticking close to him and moving with him about the room. I could not at first tell whether it was a living figure or merely a mass of white drapery, like a gigantic pillow, that he was dragging about with him; but at one time I observed them apparently three or four feet apart, when I saw that they were united by something that suggested to me the idea of a long empty sleeve. When they came opposite to me the figure beckoned to me to come forwards and took my hand. I then saw them side by side, Eglinton taking my other hand, so as to leave no possible doubt of their distinct existence. They then began to retreat towards the cabinet, facing me, and I followed, still holding the figure's hand, which he only withdrew at the entrance to the cabinet, when he waved me away. Fortunately there were better eyes than mine observing all this most interesting part of the scene, of which Miss Symons gives a much clearer account than I could. I must premise that she had never either seen or heard of the very full account of a similar materialisation published in "LIGHT" of the 28th February last. She says: "Just at this time the medium groaned terribly, then staggered out of the cabinet, and came towards us, pacing up and down in front of us, as he had done at the commencement of the séance. Again we saw the bright light, which presently died away, and then we all saw a bit of white drapery hanging from the medium's left side, as though one corner of it were stuck into his watch-pocket. We supposed that the Arab had really cut off a piece of his drapery, as we had requested, and had given it to the medium instead of to us; but what was our astonishment as we looked to see this bit of cloudy gauze expand itself gradually until a cloud seemed to rise out of the medium's side and sink to the floor. Gradually it seemed to take form, until it looked like a little child in height and size; then slowly it became taller, until it stood at least two inches taller than the medium, and once more we distinguished the form of our Arab friend. This materialisation took place within a foot in front of us, and several feet from the doorway. The spirit and medium were throughout connected by a drapery which seemed to grow out of Mr. Eglinton's side and to connect itself with the drapery of the spirit. Mr. Wedgwood stood up, and held both spirit's and medium's hands in his. The apparition then turned to the piano and thumped, loudly and distinctly, 'Home, Sweet Home,' after which Mr. Eglinton moved the curtains aside, and both he and the spirit disappeared into the inner room."

We sign this report as a correct statement of what took place.

[Mr. Hensleigh Wedgwood, J.P., of 31, Queen Anne-street, W., signs this report, and Miss Symons, as will be seen, corroborates it by a special account. Mrs. Lewis has also given us permission to append her name, and Mr. Wedgwood informs us that Miss Corner wishes to do likewise.]

CLASS O.—PSYCHOGRAPHY.

[We hope our readers will be able to furnish us with many records of psychographic séances with Mr. Eglinton. Psychographers are not a numerous class of the community; and there is always danger of their becoming extinct. It is therefore highly desirable that the evidence for their powers should be presented as clearly and circumstantially as possible. The following from a lady who remains anonymous, is a typical case. If there is a flaw, it is not perceptible to the naked eye.]

A friend and myself took closed slates, in which we had written questions at our own houses previous to our visit. Mr. Eglinton gave us the necessary nibs of pencil which we placed in the slates. We then sat, I with Mr. Eglinton's right hand in my left and my friend's left hand in my right, Mr. Eglinton holding the slate with his left hand partly under the small flat square table. In one minute the writing began, and gave an answer to the question on my slate. After that I had a letter addressing me by Christian name, and signed with the pet name of my husband, both, I need not say, quite unknown to the medium, to whom, till then, I was a perfect stranger. Mr. Eglinton then said he felt inclined to stand near my friend, and he placed doubled slates on her shoulder, pressing on the slates with his two hands; the writing began, and she had a long letter signed with her husband's name, and ending "God bless you," which was a test as he always ended his letters to her in that way. One of her children was also mentioned by name, and her own name spelt Elisa, the way she always writes it, but not the usual way, "Eliza." I think these good tests, Mr. Eglinton being quite unknown to us both. There is not the least doubt the writing was produced without any help from human hands. We both felt we had been in communion with our friends, and left with a feeling of gratitude to Mr. Eglinton as the medium of such wonderful phenomena.

June, 1885.

K.W.

In reply to a letter of cross-examination from us, our contributor writes:—

I have much pleasure in answering the questions you ask me. I was so favourably impressed with Mr. Eglinton's kind, frank manner, and the utter absence of anything like deception in the whole séance, that I am very glad to give my testimony to his straightforwardness and his most wonderful mediumistic power. I am quite sure that my friend and myself were thoroughly satisfied that Mr. Eglinton had no part whatever in dishonest production of the writing. I think the reason we had such a successful séance was that we went with unprejudiced minds. I think if we had gone with an antagonistic feeling, and that Mr. Eglinton was bent on taking us in, we should not have had such results.

The slate was apparently a closed slate. In what way was it secured?

The slate was a very large double one enclosed in wood, and fastened with a hook. The question was written on it at my own lodgings. The security was that it did not leave my own hands until we were seated for the séance, when Mr. Eglinton took it and held it with his left hand partly under the table, his right hand being joined with mine on the table.

What was the question and the answer?

My question written on the slate was, "Can you write to me, dear H., and will you answer the question I am anxious about?" (The real question to which the letter answered was a mental one, and was not written down at all.) The writing came almost directly, and was, "Yes, dearest, I am with you, and will try to answer the question."

Was the question kept secret from Mr. Eglinton?

Mr. Eglinton gave me the nib of pencil, and I opened the slate just enough to push the nib in. It was impossible for Mr. Eglinton to have seen the question, and I did not tell him what it was.

Did you make an appointment with Mr. Eglinton by letter and sign your names? Have you and Mr. Eglinton common friends?

My appointment with Mr. Eglinton was written in the third person. "Mrs. W. presents, &c." My friend and I never addressed each other by our Christian names, so that Mr. Eglinton had no clue whatever to them. He and we have no common friends.

How long a time elapsed before the commencement of the séance?

I arrived at the hour appointed, about two minutes before my friend; on her arrival we at once commenced the séance.

Will you state all that occurred during that time?

I introduced myself, remarked that I had a great wish to see if I could obtain writing, "that I had brought rather a large slate, I feared." My friend then arrived, and we sat down at once. Mr. Eglinton said that of course he could not insure success.

Upon what sort of slate did the letter to you from your husband come? Did you examine that slate thoroughly?

The slate was an ordinary new slate that my husband's letter was written on. I took it myself from a heap that was on the table. I also took one from the same heap to cover it with according to Mr. Eglinton's direction. There was no writing on either of them. The answer to my mental question was given in that letter which commenced with my Christian name and was signed "Harry," the name I always called my husband. The writing on the slate was reversed in three ways—so—os—S. The slate was held in Mr. Eglinton's left hand, his right being held by mine. My letter consisted of fifty words.

Did you examine also the slates pressed on the shoulder of your friend?

There was nothing written on the slates that were pressed on my friend's shoulder. They were taken from the same heap as mine, and were quite new. Her letter was much longer than mine. It began with her Christian name spelt as she always spells it, but which is not the usual way; mentioned one of his children by name and spoke of the others in the pet way he used to speak of them; ended in a way he always ended his letters on earth to her and signed his Christian name.

There was no possibility of fraud on the part of Mr. Eglinton; as I said before, he had never seen us until that morning, nor (until I wrote to make the appointment) knew of our existence; and we certainly gave him no clue to find out anything about ourselves. We heard distinctly the writing going on on the slates on each occasion, and the three taps on the slate at the conclusion of the writing.

How long a time elapsed between posting your letter to Mr. Eglinton and your visit to him?

I cannot recollect how long the time was between writing for the appointment and the séance itself. There must have been one intervening day, because I wrote to my friend to ask if she could go with me at that time, and, therefore, there must have been time for her answer.

Can you say that the question was answered in such a way that it could not have been accidental?

The answer to my mental question was so wonderful as an exact answer that I have written it out for you. Naturally, I should not like it published in any way, but you can testify, having seen it, how direct was the reply.

[The answer, of about fifty words, and replying to the mental question, and to that only, is as our correspondent describes it.]

I shall never forget my sensation of astonishment when I read it.

CLASS O.—PSYCHOGRAPHY.

Yesterday afternoon I had a séance with Mr. Eglinton, and I think that a relation of two of the remarkable phenomena that I witnessed will prove interesting to the readers of "LIGHT."

I had a bank-note in my pocket, and, placing it face-downwards on the table, I wrote (unknown to Mr. Eglinton) in the famous Bramah-locked slate the following question: "Will you write the number of the bank-note which is on the table?" In a very short time the spirits wrote: "Yes; but put it in the slate." I did so and locked up the slate. In a few seconds the answer was correctly given. After some more questions had been asked and answered, I placed a cigarette in the locked-up slate and asked that the name of the maker, which was printed on the cigarette-paper, might be written. The slate was put on the table, and at the same time Mr. Eglinton held an ordinary slate under the table and almost directly under the lock-up slate, for the purpose of receiving a reply to an unanswered question. In a short time we heard the sound of writing, followed by the customary three taps on the lower slate, and on that slate we found the name of the maker correctly written and also the cigarette, which had been locked up in the other slate. When we unlocked the upper slate we found nothing but a few fragments of tobacco! These facts speak for themselves; comment is superfluous.

I should add that the number of the bank-note was unknown to Mr. Eglinton or myself.—I am, sir, yours truly,

Bolton,

G. H. WOODHOUSE.

CLASS E.—PRESCIENCE.

In the year 1864, my youngest son, then about twelve years old, was studying at a college in the South of Ireland, distant about nine miles from my residence. One morning at daybreak I woke up suddenly in a state of great alarm regarding him, though why I could not tell, as I had not been dreaming; but a distinct apprehension of coming peril to him was so vivid in my mind that I could not sleep any more; and the feeling making me miserable for the day, I wrote to him stating that I feared something was going to happen, and begging if anything was the matter the principal of the college might immediately inform me of it. Next morning a letter did arrive stating that my son had got his arm broken while playing football that evening, but it had been skilfully set and was doing well.

My son still has my letter in his possession, which must have been written almost at the hour the accident occurred.

CARA.

SECOND SIGHT.—A Lewis correspondent writes that there is a tradition there of one Kenneth Oair, who lived near 200 years ago, having foretold many things which have since come to pass. Among his predictions was this, that a three-masted ship would be wrecked on the Arakachan Rock at Skijersta. The "Dunaldstair," three-masted, was pierced by striking upon that rock, last July 31st. There is another tradition talked of in the place in connection with this disaster. It is that an old woman foretold fifteen years ago, that three boats loaded with people, who did not speak Gaelic, would land on the beach there. This, so the people say, was verified by the landing of three boats from the wrecked "Dunaldstair," with the crew and passengers.—Daily Chronicle.

By EDUARD VON HARTMANN.

THE SPIRIT HYPOTHESIS.

We have now run through the whole province of phenomena heretofore observed in mediumistic sittings, and can very easily understand how by these in part highly astonishing phenomena the belief in spirits as their causes can be excited in those who, without comprehensive survey and careful criticism, give themselves up to the immediate impression of their experiences. Add belief in the existence of bodiless spirits and in the possibility of their manifestation; further, the yearning for restoration of the intercourse, interrupted by death, with beloved relatives and friends, and that they fall at length under the fascinating influence of mediums, and of the hallucinations transferred from the latter to themselves, and it would be really psychologically inexplicable if they escaped referring part of the phenomena to supernatural causes beyond the mediums. On the other hand, we have seen that, for unprejudiced critical judgment in the province traversed, with exception of true clairvoyance, there is not the slightest occasion to overstep natural explanations, and that the appearance of the contrary rests upon a psychologically explicable, but scientifically indefensible, deception. The untenability of the Spiritistic explanation will be still better apparent if we trace its gradual spiritualisation in the course of time from the grossest sensuousness, by which, however, it has also more and more cut the ground from under its feet, to the small foot-breadth whereon it now artificially balances itself, without being able from this unstable position to contribute any real explanation.

The simple, sensuous, naïve, popular belief is that the deceased survive in their old forms, but with a shadowy, penetrable, imponderable, invisible body, and wander sadly about for a long time in their wonted localities before resolving on a thorough departure from this earth, and ascent to heavenly or descent into infernal regions, from which they can then only exceptionally and transitorily return. These spirits it is, who, attracted in some inexplicable way by the proximity of a medium, manifest their presence by rappings, pushing about furniture, table movements, writing without contact, voices, and so on, and at length by borrowing vital force (blood) from the medium can become visible in their proper forms. When an explanation of something is wanted, a spirit must have done it; how the spirit has brought the phenomenon about is his affair; a spirit must be able to do everything, just because he is a spirit. This belief, common to all the old nations and in the main also still to the lower populace of to-day, has received its systematic development among the Indians, who suppose that besides the Pitris (ancestor-spirits) living persons also leave their bodies, and with their immortal astral body or phantom can transport themselves to distant places to appear to others. A psychology which is not yet better acquainted with the province of hallucinations must necessarily grasp at such a hypothesis; we however, may be content to estimate the latter according to this its historical and psychological foundation.

This naïve belief in spirits receives in application to mediumistic phenomena its first blow from the consideration, that the medium in that case is also a spirit, and that if in the somnambulist state he has freed himself from the limitations of the ordinary body, he must also be able to do all that spirits of the deceased could do. It could thus be conceived that the spirit of the medium has gone out with his astral body from his entranced body, moves about in the room, and makes a disturbance with the other spirits that are present. Here then already is a division of labour between the spirits and the spirit of the medium, but the way in which the medium's own spirit performs its part is still the same crassly sensuous one, as that in which the ancestor-spirits also act, namely, by contact of the limbs of their invisible astral body, to the exclusion of all mechanical action at a distance. So the explanation by spirits appeared still always as the proximate one, that through the vagrant spirit of the medium as one derivative, and immediately involved in difficulties if the medium was not in cataleptic hypnosis but in waking or masked somnambulist consciousness.

The idea once conceived, that some of the phenomena proceed from the medium himself, now demands its rights for the case also of his continuing conscious, and the demonstration of mediumistic nerve-force and its effects at a certain distance subverts the naïve conception. The mediumistic nerve-force was designated by the misleading term "psychic force," and its seat was therefore sought in the soul instead of in the nervous system of the medium. The explanation of the phenomena by the psychic force of the medium was now all at once accepted as the proximate one, and the assistance of the psychic force of spirits as derivative. For a very slight critical circumspection must lead to the perception, that spirits having invisible, impalpable astral limbs, penetrative of all matter, and without muscles and bones, could also not lay hold and raise, but must accomplish their dynamical effects in a spiritual way, for which the "psychical force" of the medium seemed to offer the closest and only analogy.

With the attainment of this reversed position, it followed that the trial must next be made, how far explanation of the phenomena by referring them to the medium sufficed, recourse to that by spirits being then first allowable, if the former explanation should appear for any reason defective. Already at this point, probably, would the spirit hypothesis have collapsed, if only the physical phenomena had had to be dealt with; but so long as the co-operation of spirits appeared still indispensable, at any rate, for the ideality of the manifestations and for the supposed materialisations, there was no hesitation in admitting the co-operation of the re-affirmed spirits also in the physical phenomena. But already in this phase it began to be confessed that most of the phenomena were to be referred to the medium as their single cause. Davis ("Present Age," pp. 197, 161, 134) had already admitted this of 60 per cent. of the phenomena, and the later German Spiritists, like Hellenbach, carry this admission much further still.

Just for closer occupation with the materialisation phenomena was it reserved yet further to undermine the spirit-hypothesis. As long as people were involved in the naïve belief the spirits managed all the rappings and table movements with their own hands, and spoke without making use of the medium's organs of speech, the co-operation of the medium in materialisations remained limited to suffering the substances of his body to be drawn off by the spirits, who used them to make their forms wandering invisibly among us, visible and palpable. The external ordering of sittings was guided by this idea, and no Spiritist at first thought that the medium could be actively participant in the affair. This naïve conception was shattered by numerous "exposures," in which the captured phantom was unmasked as the medium himself. Now first began the distinction between transfigurations and materialisations, and finally the abidance of the produced phantom with the medium had to be recognised as the rule, and its detachment as the exception. Moreover, the detachment remained usually incomplete; sometimes only limbs or heads, or mere trunk with stumps (P's. St. VIII. 53; IX., 146-147) were visible at some distance from the medium; sometimes from the lower part of the recumbent medium's body there rose over the upper part the upper part of a phantom. When, however, a complete detachment ensued, and the phantom was observed in the process of its origination and disappearance, it appeared that it streamed out wholly and entirely from the medium, and streamed back into him, and that not as a prepared form gradually filling itself with and again emptying itself of substance, but as a formless cloud, first gradually acquiring shape, and again dissolving into shapelessness.

It thence undoubtedly followed that the medium himself was the unconscious producer of the phantoms, as well of those detached as of those undetached, that in the medium was to be sought, not only the passive source of substance for the visibility of the forms, but besides the substance-giving also the form-giving and formative cause of the apparitions, of the objective reality of which no doubt at first arose in the Spiritist camp. It then needed very little critical reflection to see that spirits, whether thought of as free from body altogether or clothed with an astral body, ether body, or meta-organism, must in any case belong to a wholly different order of things, and that in no case did they go about among us invisibly with a form of the same spatial dimensions as the organisms they laid aside at death, least of all clothed with spiritual garments, like those worn in life, so that there could be no talk of a mere making visible of the already present form. If a spirit would be manifest to spectators, it is easy to conceive that he would choose for this purpose the form and clothing known to them from his former life, but this form must first be completely reproduced, and to that the spirit as such would be unequal, and must require the substance-giving and form-giving production of the medium. To the spirit, if he wishes to manifest to us, there is nothing for it but to enter the medium, and with the substances and forces of the latter thence to make himself recognisable, like one who is stuck in a sack, and can only gesticulate through it.

Thus Spiritism arrived at regarding all physical effects and all materialisation phenomena as products of the medium, and at considering the spirits only as the machine-masters, whose will and intelligence stand behind the mediums in the intention to manifest, and set going the powers hidden in the organism. The spirits according to this view have ceased immediately and personally to bring about effects in the realm of earthly nature, but remain the transcendent causes of the phenomena which the medium produces without will and consciousness. A critical solution of the confusion of "mediumistic nerve-force" with "psychical force" must necessitate the abandonment of the simple sense belief in spirits; for whatever else spirits may have in themselves, a nervous system by means of which they could produce discharges of nerve-force (as roaches electrical discharges), they have as little as a muscular system, by means of which they would lift and shove tables and chairs.

Thus the hypothesis of the direct agency of spirits is refined to that of spirit agency exclusively mediated by the medium; the latter is now the only executive, and the spirits retire to the position of mere intellectual authors of the phenomena. Since, however, they take possession of the will-less and consciousnessless medium, the psychical side of the production is still reserved to them, and it is for the present only the bodily side which they have had to resign to the medium. The spirit of the medium himself is thereby, so far as necessary, temporarily dispossessed of its governance over the body, and its place is assumed by the "controlling spirit." It is therefore the will of the controlling spirit which so directs and guides the innervation-impulse proceeding from the medium's brain that involuntary muscular movements arise in the medium's limbs, or mediumistic nerve-force is developed; it is the strange spirit in person who through the corpse of the medium produces manuscript or writing at a distance. Just so is it this spirit, whose phantasy broods over the form to be materialised, and which effectuates the forces laid up and slumbering in the medium's organism. The whole external side of the phenomena has now its origin in the medium, and only the inner side, the ideal content of the manifestations, is it now, which seems to make co-operation of spirits indispensable, and that because it is presupposed that the medium in the consciousnessless sleep-state has no longer intelligence for the disposition of the phenomena, and in the waking state has no other than the waking consciousness which is unparticipant in them.

The hypothesis of mediate spirit agency may at this stage be called the hypothesis of possession; for so far as his true consciousness has lost dominion over his organism, the medium is possessed by the controlling spirits. In this proceeding the spirit of the medium is entirely thrown off. Either he is sunk in complete unconsciousness, or the remnant of persisting consciousness no longer commands the innervation-impulse requisite to the occurrence of the phenomena, has even no direct knowledge of the use which the controlling spirit makes of his organism and its forces, but just like the spectators is first aware of the phenomena when they have occurred, and have become perceptible to sense. This hypothesis of possession is, of course, a great advance upon the simple spirit-belief, because it takes into account observed facts, at least in relation to the external side of the phenomena, but it is untenable, because it still does not take them into account in relation to the inner side, i.e., the ideality of the manifestations. It corresponds to a psychology which by the human spirit understands nothing but the contents of its normal, waking consciousness, and has still no suspicion of relatively or absolutely unconscious desires, feelings, and ideas. It is utterly confuted by the single fact of somnambulism, that there is a condition in which people give expression to the content of their consciousness by words and acts while their waking consciousness is quite suppressed or debilitated, and in which the (subsequent or simultaneous) waking consciousness knows nothing of the contents of the somnambulant consciousness, while the latter is nevertheless aware of the former. If a medium in somnambulant consciousness can by word of mouth accurately disclose the purport of a previously produced writing at a distance, of which his waking consciousness knew nothing, this affords cogent proof that the somnambulant consciousness of the medium is not thrown off or overleaped in his mediumistic results, but is somehow participant in them. This is proved by the fact that all manifestations show a content corresponding to the medium's intellectual level and ideas, that they are all coloured by the local and personal tone, so to speak, of the medium. Advancing from the explanation of transfiguration and materialisation phenomena by dynamical substantial efflorescence from the medium to that by hallucination-transference, hallucination in the medium's somnambulant consciousness (in connection with the will to transfer) has thus attained increased importance as the immediate origin of the subjective phenomena of the spectators.

Now if the participation of the somnambulant consciousness, together with the action of the parts of the brain supporting it, must undeniably be admitted, it follows that the passage of the controlling spirit's ideas and volitions can no longer be thought of as a purely passive proceeding; on the other hand the co-operation of the controlling spirit with the medium's spirit cannot be conceived as a concurrence in the control over the organism, such as actually exists between the somnambulant and waking consciousness in masked somnambulism. Rather must the single dominion over those parts and forces of the organism, which the mediumistic phenomena bring into play, be conceded to the somnambulant consciousness and the parts of the brain supporting it; and the agency of the controlling spirit must be confined to eliciting in the somnambulant consciousness of the medium those desires, feelings, and ideas, which are requisite for the spirit manifestation. Then away goes utterly the conception of possession, for it is converted into the heterogeneous conception of inspiration; the hypothesis of possession has become refined throughout into the hypothesis of inspiration.

According to the inspiration-hypothesis, it is the medium's own somnambulant consciousness which will write particular sentences or bring about the apparition of a particular form; but what sentences and what form hovers before it for production shall not depend on psychical processes in the medium's spirit, but upon what thoughts or form the controlling spirit conveys from its consciousness into the somnambulant consciousness of the medium. Now first is the intellectual authorship of spirits reduced to its true and finer sense, because demanding as its correlate not simply a temporarily lifeless organism but the unity of body and soul of the executive person. First at this turn the spirit-hypothesis enters a stage which enables psychology and metaphysics becomingly to deal with it seriously and critically, whereas the foregoing is to serve only for the historical information of the reader.

Thought-transference is a conception already current with us; if there are "spirits" it could well be supposed possible from a spirit to a man, as it is possible between two men. Meanwhile there are still difficulties in this supposition which are not to be under-rated. The spirit of a deceased person has no brain, whose vibrations could induce similar vibrations in a human brain in proximity; mechanical mediation by ether vibrations, as we can suppose them in thought-transference between persons in immediate proximity without contact, thus fails for spirits who would transmit, and there only remains the other kind of thought-transference without material mediation, which seems to be limited to no distance. In fact, also, later Spiritists suppose on the ground of mediumistic communications (kungebungen) that the controlling spirit may be at any distance whatever from the manifesting medium, without the intimacy of the rapport between them being thereby prejudiced. The misfortune here only is that at far distances, according to our experiences, no thoughts or words whatever can be transferred, but only sensible and most lively hallucinations, such as seem exclusively able to be developed in the parts of the brain supporting somnambulant consciousness; but spirits have no brains, neither the parts supporting waking, nor those supporting somnambulant consciousness, and their thoughts can, therefore, hardly be conscious with that lively hallucinatory sensuousness, rendered possible only by the somnambulant parts of the brain, which are proximate to the sense apparatus. There is no sort of pretext for admitting that the conditions of thought-transference from a spirit to the somnambulant consciousness of a man are more favourable than for that from the somnambulant consciousness of another man; there is nothing apparent which could compensate for the difficulty suggested, so that one has to fall back on the naive popular belief that a spirit must be able to do everything just because he is a spirit. Just that, for instance, which is characteristic of the effective representation of a deceased person in the phantasy of a medium at a materialisation sitting, the hallucinatory sensuousness, must be wanting to the self-representation of the spirit, while that with which one could soonest credit the spirit, the wordless ideal substance of sentences to be written, is again, according to our experiences, not transferable at a distance.

To these formal difficulties of transference are added others still, relating to the purport of the communications. This purport is usually below the intellectual level of the medium and those present, and at the highest comes up to it, but is never above it. The fact is quite intelligible, if the somnambulant consciousness of the medium is the sole intellectual source, but it demolishes the spirit hypothesis. For if the spirits have, or from the position of things are able to reveal, nothing better than what we ourselves already know, away goes the single motive which can be assigned for their disposition to manifest, the wish to make us wiser and better than we otherwise are.

Apart from these considerations of form and substance, the spirit hypothesis is at the stage of the inspiration-hypothesis above all superfluous, a fifth wheel to the cart. At the stage of the possession hypothesis spirit-co-operation seemed still indispensable only by reason of the supposition that the medium had no intelligence at his disposal besides his (either suppressed or displaced) waking consciousness. At the stage of the inspiration-hypothesis, this supposition no longer existing, it must first be inferred from the particular import of the communications that the medium's somnambulant consciousness was not able to produce it. As long as nothing is known of the hyperesthesia of somnambulant memory, thought-reading, and clairvoyance, all those communications pass for revelations of inspiring spirits, which show an ideal content foreign to the waking consciousness of the medium, or evidently so by way of his sense perception. As soon, however, as these three sources of knowledge besides sense-perception are conceded, there is generally no ideal content thinkable, which would be naturally incapable of derivation from them.

Spiritism, however, cannot dispute the possibility of thought-transference from one mind to others, and of clairvoyance, without cutting away the possibility of inspiration itself; for what the inspiring spirit knows, it can only, failing organs of sense perception, have learnt by clairvoyance or thought-reading, and what the medium's somnambulant consciousness receives from this spirit, can only be received by inspiration, that is, by thought-transference. The interposition of the thought-reading (or clairvoyant) and inspiring spirit between the thought-reading (or clairvoyant) medium, and the ideal purport to be perceived is thus not a solution, but only a doubling of the difficulty inherent in the problem of thought-reading or clairvoyance, aggravated by the circumstance that for the reasons pointed out, thought-reading from the consciousness of a bodiless spirit is much more difficult for the medium than that from the thoughts of another man, especially one sitting by him and connected with him by direct or indirect bodily contact.

Thus has the whole spirit hypothesis resolved itself into a pure nothing, when first the direct physical force performances, then the production of materialisation phenomena, and lastly that of the ideality of the manifestations have been shifted from the supposed spirits to the medium. Whether there are spirits or not we have not here to inquire; at all events, they are relegated, if they exist, to that beyond, from which Spiritism thought to have drawn them down.

There are some general methodological axioms which are not to be transgressed with impunity. First, principles are not to be multiplied without necessity; thus a second sort of causes are not to be supposed, as long as a single sort will suffice. Secondly, we should as long as possible abide by causes whose existence is guaranteed by experience or indubitable inference, and should not unnecessarily catch at causes of doubtful or unproven existence, such as are to be first established by their value as hypothesis for the explanation of phenomena in question. Thirdly, we should as long as possible try to do with natural causes and not touch supernatural ones without urgent necessity. Against these three axioms Spiritism offends. The one, empirically given, natural sort of cause which we possess in the mediums it recognises indeed, but along with that it sets up a second, not empirically given, supernatural sort of cause, the existence of which is to be proved for the first time by this phenomenal province in question.

Now in order that with the first sort of cause we should allow the second also to avail, Spiritism must feel constrained to apply its whole force to define exactly the boundary line, beyond which the explanatory power of the first sort of cause ceases, and to show with the most careful critique why its sufficiency ceases beyond this line. So long as this definition of boundary and this proof are not forthcoming, the burden of proof lying on the asserter of the second sort of cause is not discharged, but Spiritism has not as yet made the least attempt to acquit itself of this obligation. So long as that remains unfulfilled the spirit-hypothesis lacks any glimmer of scientific foundation and warrant, and all philosophers who have adopted the spirit-hypothesis of Spiritism have shown thereby a serious deficiency of critical circumspection.

FINIS.

[Having finished my task, I might ask leave to offer some remarks on what I conceive to be the significance of this pamphlet, its value for the public and for English Spiritualists, as also defects which experienced investigators cannot fail to detect in it. But I believe I shall do better by offering to the readers of "LIGHT" the following translation of a review by Dr. Carl du Prel, in the German Gegenwart.—Tr.]

EDUARD VON HARTMANN ON "SPIRITISM." By Carl du Prel. (From Die Gegenwart, No. 27.)

Important questions of the day should always be brought as soon as possible before the forum of philosophy, to withdraw them from the contentions of parties, which can never discover of themselves that each is only half right and its opponent only half wrong. In this way Hartmann lately subjected the Jew question to an objective examination, and in his most recent treatise he discusses Spiritism. Historical and contemporary evidence leaves him in no doubt that there are in man forces which science has not investigated; he has himself no experience in Spiritist phenomena, and will only deliver a judgment on the conclusions to be drawn from the phenomena, conditional on their reality. Science has unfortunately hitherto neglected its duty to prepare the way for philosophy by establishment of the Spiritist facts. Hartmann is quite right in urging this research upon official science, but he, the pessimist, is committed to an optimism unintelligible to me, in supposing that this challenge will be of any use. New truths must be a hundred years old, and become commonplace, before the learned concern themselves with them. That it always has been so is historically provable, and psychologically it can be shown why it always is so. It is about a hundred years ago, for instance, that Mesmer rediscovered animal magnetism, but first, after Hansen had afforded the proof a thousand times by public representations in numerous German cities, did some physiologists and physicians taken up the research, yet in a short time these good intentions went to sleep again. Now, without a fundamental knowledge of magnetism and somnambulism, Spiritism is unintelligible; so that it may be calculated how long our academicians will require to qualify themselves for the task Hartmann assigns to them. Before that, perhaps the Governments will respond to his summons to appoint commissions of investigation.

Hartmann is convinced that the spirit theory is untenable, and all the phenomena find their explanation in the mediums. He accepts a special kind of nerve-force, manifesting itself in the auto-somnambulant condition of the medium. This is converted into light and heat vibrations, and can be accumulated in the organism up to the point at which discharges result, and it can be directed by the will. Thus are to be explained the diverse phenomena of mediums; raps, attractions and repulsions of material objects, lights, and distant effects. Hartmann connects this nerve-force, as an intelligent power, with the layers of the middle brain, to be regarded as the supporter of somnambulant consciousness. Some of his ideas the medium obtains by thought-reading. But Hartmann does not deny that other ideas of the medium can only flow from a metaphysical source. There is a true clairvoyance, a far-seeing in time and space. But Hartmann is a Pantheist, and as such recognises only the earthly phenomenal form of man, and the world-substance in which we are immediately rooted, not, however, the intermediate, that is the transcendental subject of man with its supersensuous consciousness and faculties. He is, therefore, obliged to explain all clairvoyance as inspiration. Since the individuals are rooted in the Absolute they have in this a mutual connection; far-seeing in time and space can occur, because in the absolute knowledge of the absolute spirit the threads of all causal series are entwined to a single collective intuition. Now that Hartmann should seek to bring these phenomena into harmony with the philosophy of the unconscious is certainly very natural; but I believe that Kant has judged more truly in his "Dreams of a ghost-seer": that if clairvoyance could be proved we should have to distinguish between Subject and Person in man. With such a metaphysical individualism we, in fact, obtain a great light upon the phenomena of somnambulism and Spiritism, which are thus very good tests of philosophical systems.

The medium's somnambulant phantasy, by a sort of dramatic self-sundering, transfers the ideas emerging from its unconscious to a foreign source, and the images created by it stand as hallucinations before it. These are the spirits of which the medium speaks in complete good faith. The medium acts, however, as Hartmann says, on the participants in the sitting like a strong magnetiser, who—as Hansen has frequently demonstrated—can implant in his subjects any ideas whatever; he transfers his hallucinations to the participants, and so it comes that these also see spirits.

Should it be a mere illusion that the medium has, he takes himself for the spirit, and his somnambulant phantasy undertakes only some metamorphoses of form and toilette; if, on the other hand, complete hallucination occurs, the medium sees the phantom external to himself. To these different conditions on the medium's side, correspond, by means of hallucination-transference, likewise two cases on the side of the spectators; to the medium's illusion corresponds transfiguration, in which the medium steps out of the cabinet as a somnambulant lay figure, clothed upon by the spirit toilette. If, now, an "enlightened" sceptic seizes the phantom, of course the medium is within it; he supposes that he has exposed the medium, but has only exposed his own ignorance in Spiritistic matters, and also risks inflicting injury on the medium, because it is dangerous to violently awaken a somnambulant. But now, as the toilette, according to Hartmann, consists only in the hallucination transferred to the spectators, it will be always quite in vain on the occasion of such exposures to look for the supposed masquerade dress. If, on the other hand, the point of actual hallucination is attained in the medium, there steps before the spectators a materialisation, i.e., they see a phantom disengaged from the medium, who is lying in a trance.

This theory of Hartmann's is, in the highest degree, complicated; and I am convinced that he will himself abandon it, as soon as he shall have acquired the personal experience indispensable in Spiritism. A magnetiser can doubtless transfer the ideas of his imagination to others—whereupon Richet's "L'Homme et l'Intelligence," and Du Potet's "La Magie Devoilée," should be consulted—but photographic plates are notoriously not hallucinated, and phantoms have been often photographed. Crookes' case, of the phantom and medium represented on one plate, Hartmann knows, but he puts it aside with the assertion that one of the two forms seems only the medium's clothes stuffed with a cushion. With such assertions Hartmann will indeed conciliate the ignorant, but no serious reader will believe that one of the first of English experts and experimenters, investigating with a child in his own study for four years, has been so grossly duped by her.

Photographic plates, therefore, prove the phantoms objective. There can thus be no talk of mere hallucinations. The Pantheist, indeed, will be disposed to deny objective phantoms of human form as long as possible, because they afford the proof that we are not immediately rooted in the thing in itself, but indirectly survive our earthly phenomenal form.

Hartmann accuses those philosophers who have adopted the spirit hypothesis, without first inquiring how far the explanation by the medium's nerve-force extends, of want of critical circumspection. This reproach, which is especially directed against Uriel, Perty, Hoffmann, the younger Fichte, and Hellenbach, is, however, certainly not justified. Every one who investigates in this province begins naturally by explaining these phenomena by the medium. Perty held nearly all his life to the explanation by magical powers of the medium, but had to give the theory up at last, driven by facts of nature and his own experience. Hartmann would find the same, could he resolve upon personal investigation.

In order, precisely, to state my own views in relation to Hartmann's, I must therefore say, Hartmann holds the medium to be the cause of the phenomena; the medium acts psychically, because he forms hallucinations and implants them in the spectators. In my view, on the other hand, the medium is only the condition—conditio sine qua non—of the phenomena; he does not act psychically, but only organically by giving off material for the formation of the phantom. Hartmann's view is contradicted by photography; mine is confirmed by the circumstance that the medium is dispensable; his place can be supplied, or at least his production can be heightened by organic substances. That was already known to the necromancers in Homer and in the Middle Ages, who, therefore, made use of corresponding fumigations. When Hellenbach, in one of his experiments, distributed organic substances in different scales, the contents proved, after the sitting, to have been partially consumed.

Accordingly I believe that Hartmann has drawn the line between the subjective and the objective in the Spiritist phenomena decidedly at the wrong place. That, however, may perhaps even have useful result, for those particularly called on to investigate might possibly be roused from their indolence by the prospect of dealing a deathblow to superstition in the way Hartmann points out. But, on the other hand, looking at the uncritical zeal of Spiritists, it is very beneficial to remind them that Spiritism is certainly a mixed province of the subjective and objective, and that by drawing the dividing line at the wrong place they reduce the subjective province just as much as Hartmann the objective.

At all events it is Hartmann's enduring merit, that he has had the courage to pronounce Spiritism to be at least highly exigent of investigation.

A PROBLEM FOR CONJURERS.

By CARL DU PREL. (Munich.)

(Translated by T.)

"Quam multa flori non posse, priusquam facta sint, judicantur."

I.—THE FACTS.

It is well-known that public opinion in Germany is opposed to recognising the phenomena of Spiritualism as genuine, but no one can deny the fact of the rapid spread of belief in Spiritualism, even in Germany. On both accounts a scientific inquiry into the so-called Spiritualistic phenomena is highly necessary, in order—if it be all humbug—that a stop should be put to a morbid epidemic; or if it be true, for the sake of truth itself. Such an inquiry seems the more necessary since Spiritualism is greatly on the increase, not only as regards the large number of its adherents, but also as to the weight of the evidence for it—the latter, indeed, in a two-fold manner. I shall scarcely meet with contradiction when I say that the question whether Spiritualistic phenomena are the result of trickery is one scientists and philosophers are scarcely the proper persons to decide; but, in the first place, conjurers themselves. Now, the most skilful conjurers, such as Bosco, Houdin, Bellachini, Hamilton, &c., have pronounced the mediums with whom they have been brought in contact free from suspicion of imposture. On the other side, however, the question as to the reality of the phenomena is quite suited to scientific men, since these latter have proved themselves both cautious and skilful in experiments in scientific departments. Only to mention a few well-known names, such as Crookes, Wallace, and Zöllner, this cannot be denied, and these professors have declared their belief in the genuineness of the phenomena.

Now, since it is quite justifiable to challenge or invite conjurers to perform the phenomena themselves, and under the same conditions, and, since their judgment would be of great value, I bring before their notice, in the following pages, a problem for them to solve.

During my last visit to Vienna, in consequence of a kind invitation, I had the opportunity of being present at a series of séances given at four different houses, and in the following pages I shall recount the results of these séances, in which the experiments in slate-writing made by Professor Zöllner with the American medium, Slade, as described by him in his "Transcendental Physics," were repeated. I select these among the many séances I have been present at, to describe, because the first took place in full daylight; the second by the light of six large lamps, distributed about the table and the room; the third by that of three gas burners over the table; and only the fourth in darkness. The medium in the three first instances was Mr. Eglinton, from London, in the last a private gentleman of high education, a member of the Academy, whose name I am not authorised to mention, and to whom I was introduced by a professor of Vienna.

It is well-known that Spiritualistic phenomena usually demand a darkened room; sometimes they are produced in semi-darkness, and only where the mediumistic power is very strong can they take place in full light.* Respecting slate-writing, there is this favourable circumstance—that the room may be as light as can be wished, since the necessary condition of darkness can be secured, independently of the lightness of the room. For instance, a common slate may be laid upon the table, in which situation the under side of it is in darkness; or it may be held under the flap of the table, when the top side will be in darkness; or a double-folding slate may be used, bound together like a book, in which case (when closed) both the surfaces of the slate will be in the dark, and it can be held at pleasure either above or under the table, or suspended in the air. It is only, therefore, a question, in the case of the darkened slate, which it is out of the medium's power to write upon, of receiving written answers to questions put at the moment, and for which purpose a morsel of slate pencil is previously placed upon or under it. It is clear that under such circumstances, deception is simply impossible, if the person experimenting has a sound eye. I possess two of them, and remarkably good ones. Be it said, by-the-way, that the hypothesis of prepared slates is simply too ludicrous, as the following experiments will show:—

It is the easier to determine that the writing is really direct, and not obtained indirectly through the medium, because—

Firstly, the medium's power of action is restrained, his hands being on or holding the slate;

Secondly, in some cases, even this is superfluous, the mere presence of the medium being sufficient;

Thirdly, the medium has no knowledge of the questions, which may be written at a distance from him either on a common slate or on a double one.

Under such conditions even a blind person could not be deceived.

It is very easy, too, to ascertain whether the writing has been done with the bit of pencil placed on or under the slate, by previously marking it and noticing whether, especially in the case of a lengthy communication, it is worn down. And, lastly, the sound of the writing is to be distinctly heard, and the vibration felt by the hand laid upon it. The fact, however, that the medium knows nothing whatever of the question, and, indeed, does not want to know it, is a complete proof that the answer is written after the question is asked, verbally or in writing. As a circumstance, which perhaps may not always be the rule, occurred to me on several occasions, I just add that the writing does not appear directed towards the medium, but towards the inquirer, when the latter is sitting opposite the medium.

As in every operation in the world, so in the case of slate-writing, some force must be at the bottom of it. Therefore the question must be asked from what source is the mechanical power necessary to produce these writings drawn? In the first place, this source is the medium; the slight convulsions to which he is subject—though this is not the case with every medium—prove that power is being taken from him. But power is likewise evidently drawn from the circle of experimenters, whose hands, laid upon the table, form a chain. At one of the sances at which I was present, when I removed the outside finger of my right hand and afterwards of my left from that of my neighbour's on either side, the writing immediately ceased, and recommenced directly I replaced my fingers, and thus completed the chain. The same phenomenon is narrated by Zöllner in his "Transcendental Physics."

* This only refers to certain of the phenomena.—Ed.

This power being given for the mechanical process of writing, another force, however, is required for the production of intelligent communications—that of intelligence. That such is present is proved by the sensible and suitable answers given to the questions asked. According to my experience, it is simply untrue that, as some persons assert, the answers are generally silly and trifling; one of these says "they belong to the department of higher or lower imbecility, especially to the latter—that is, have no meaning whatever."

Now, what is the active intelligence employed? It cannot be that of the medium, since he is unacquainted with the question put; besides which the answers are frequently written in languages unknown to him. At one of the sances at which, besides myself and the medium, a lady and gentleman were present, Mr. Eglinton's knowledge of German being scarcely worth mentioning, three-fourths of a slate were covered rapidly and audibly with German writing, the rest containing a special message to the lady. The writing in German, which was not in answer to a question, was as follows: "This is the real truth, which is here manifested; the facts speak for themselves. Is it not the duty of everyone, with any pretension to intelligence, to search out the hidden secrets of nature and of human life? To come to you in this wise must comfort aching hearts, and lead you to the knowledge of the future life." When I asked the person chosen to write a short question on some ordinary subject on the slate, he took it into a corner of the room, and when he had done so and brought it back to the table, we laid our hands upon it, when immediately the sound of writing was heard, and when the slate was uncovered we read the question and the answer to it, which was quite correct: "What time is it?" "Twelve minutes after three o'clock."

It is not surprising that the answers should generally be short, as much more power must be required than is needed for ordinary writing and speaking, and the frequently insufficient power of the medium and circle is sparsely supplied to the acting intelligence. This brevity, however, as long as it does not interfere with the sense, can only be considered in favour of the intelligence. For instance, when I put the question as to what I should say to Eglinton's "exposers" (Eutargeen) in Munich, the answer, given in English, was as short as it was to the point. It was, "If anyone considers this brevity a cause for suspicion, I can easily give him a longer reply."

One morning, when I was in company with Eglinton and Baron Hellenbach, it was proposed, by slate-writing, that we three should hold a sance without any other persons being present. This took place the same evening, and Baron Hellenbach and I came to the conclusion that we should obtain the best results if we allowed things to take their own course, instead of, as is usual when sceptics are present, imposing any conditions or tests. This condition was fully justified by the result, and the proofs of the phenomena could not have been greater. Eglinton himself declared afterwards that it was the best sitting he had ever had. Our slates lay upon a table illuminated by three gas-burners; Eglinton, whom we left completely to himself, soon became evidently in a state of semi-consciousness, acting instinctively and without conscious will. At first he sat at the table, but soon stood up and began to walk up and down, speaking in an altered voice. He next asked Baron Hellenbach for a blank sheet of paper, and when a packet was handed to him, taken out of a writing-case, of rather stiff note-paper, about the size of a post-card, he took a sheet, laid it upon the table, and then went to a bookcase, took out a book at hazard, which proved to be Zöllner's "Transcendental Physics," which he likewise laid upon the table. He then tore off a corner of the sheet of note-paper, which he put in my hand, after which he placed the blank sheet in the book, placing likewise a morsel of lead pencil in it, and then closed it. We then united our six hands together above the book, Eglinton kneeling between us on the floor, and Baron Hellenbach put a question on a matter connected with his private affairs and studies, which demanded a long answer. In a very few seconds I thought I felt the vibration of the writing in one of my hands; and when I put my ear down to the book, I distinctly heard the muffled sound that rapid writing, under such circumstances, would produce. Three quick raps, coming in the same muffled manner from the book, informed us (as usual) that we should open it, and on doing so we found, between pages 386 and 387, the lately blank sheet of note-paper covered with thirty closely-written lines. The corner of the paper which was torn off, with its edges sharp and jagged, on account of the thickness of the paper, fitted exactly; while a later examination showed a slight impression of this on the top page of the book, though not the slightest mark of the pencil. The message was written in the English language, but was not finished, and only partly answered the question which had been put.

Encouraged by this result, we allowed the medium to follow his impulses, which still continued to have the character of being involuntary. He now pushed the slates lying upon the table nearer to us, and placed a blank sheet of paper in one of them, which was a double-folding slate, and another similar sheet between two ordinary slates, laid one atop of the other, providing each with a point of lead pencil, and, with obvious effort, made several magnetic passes above the folding slate, probably because the wooden frame in which it was bound rendered the experiment more difficult. We then spread our hands on both slates, and Baron Hellenbach declared, after a few seconds, that he could feel the writing going on inside the slates on which his hands alone were resting. I laid my head down to the other, and distinctly heard the writing going on within them. I do not venture to assert that writing was positively going on in both at the same time, but I think it quite possible; the more so as Zöllner, in describing an experiment, narrates that, with two bits of slate pencil placed on one slate, writing was found done at the same time from right to left, and from left to right. In the case of the present experiment, the simultaneity of the writing on both sheets of paper could not be decided, because we had no way of testing that writing was going on on both at the same moment; but the rapidity with which the answer was given seems even the more wonderful if the writing were done first on one sheet and then on the other. Now, again, the raps were heard; we opened the slates, and found on one sheet twenty-eight, and on the other twenty-four closely-written lines, completing the answer already begun on the first sheet, which had been placed inside the book, and written in well-chosen language, and very intelligently. The writing was quite unlike that of Eglinton himself, with which I afterwards compared it. On the other hand, it exactly resembled not only the signature of Ernest, but the handwriting on another slate, which had been given when I was not present, in the English, German, and Greek languages.

I repeat that, by the light of three gas-burners, we were able to watch Eglinton's every movement closely, and that no kind of suspicious circumstance of any sort was to be observed. If the sceptic, however, will deny us the capacity of sight, and assert that Eglinton was able to write quickly, and, in some way or other, insert the sheets of paper, even in this case it could only be the under side which was written on, because the top side we distinctly saw to be blank; but when we ourselves opened the slates, the top side was written upon; therefore Eglinton must not only have been clever enough to write with rapidity eighty-two lines unseen by us, by the light of three gas-burners, in answer to a question which had not yet been put on the sheets of paper which had been handed to him, but he must have been able to turn the sheets upside down when they were in a shut-up book and a locked slate, upon which our hands were resting. It here really seems as though scepticism, carried to an undus point, strongly resembles idiocy.

A CHAPTER OF RESEARCH

IN THE

OBJECTIVE PHENOMENA OF SPIRITUALISM.

II.—Cases of Materialization where the Medium is Secluded from Observation.

4.—PRESENTED UNDER SOME SPECIAL TEST.

The group of cases which I now approach is distinguished by the presentation of the form under some special condition of test. For example, we have cases in which the form is manifestly not the body of the medium, because both are visible at the same time; or because of the great variety of forms of both sexes and many ages which are seen in the course of a single sance; or because, again, the process of building up the figure has been watched by the observers, being effected in their very midst; or, lastly, because of some specially applied tests which make it impossible that the medium should be personating the form.

In dealing with these pieces of evidence, which will complete the body of testimony that I offer in cases of form-manifestation in presence of a secluded medium, I will first deal with special tests in the

(1) PRESENTATION OF MEDIUM AND FORM TO VIEW AT THE SAME TIME.

I select cases which are no better in themselves than many others, but which are sufficiently illustrative for my purpose.*

And first, I quote an account† of a private sance held at the house of Mrs. FitzGerald, at which some well-known Spiritualists were present. After a narration of familiar phenomena the materialization of John King is thus described:—

"The back drawing-room doing duty for a cabinet, we invited the medium to make himself comfortable upon a couch close by the curtain separating the two rooms. . . . A bright light was seen in the back room, and John King's face and form were seen through the partly-opened curtains. Suddenly the latter were drawn right back at one extremity of the circle, and the sitters at that extremity saw standing over the couch and illuminating from head to foot with his spirit-lamp the unconscious medium reclining on it, the finely draped and majestic figure of 'John King.' He closed the curtain at one semi-circle, and drew back that at the other end that all of us might distinctly see . . . the spirit and the medium both present at the same time. This test was repeated several times." [1873.]

Again, Mr. Webster Glynes describes‡ a private sance held under carefully guarded conditions, at the Westminster Palace Hotel, on December 16th, 1873, by Prince Emile de Sayn Wittgenstein, in which, in the rooms occupied by the Prince, the medium was seen by both Mr. Glynes and himself, with John King bending over him and holding his lamp so as to throw its light upon the entranced medium. Both observers testify to the completely satisfactory nature of what they saw. [1874.]

The next account§ is one of a test sance, held at Mr. Martheze's, Mr. Williams the medium, at Brighton. Mr. Martheze, an old and experienced Spiritualist, states:—

"John King came out with his lamp; he came over the table to us, and floated up to the ceiling. He placed the light in each of our hands. He requested me to walk into the back room to see Mr. Williams in his chair. I did so, and John King moved his light over Williams's form and face, so that I saw his features clearly. Mr. Heaton saw his features too." In a note the Editor says: "Mr. Heaton informs us that he saw the whole form of John King standing outside the curtains and holding them back to allow the spectators to look into the cabinet, where, by the light of the lamp, he saw Mr. Williams reclining on the chair." [1875.]

* Since this was written the wealth of evidence on this, as on kindred subjects, has very largely increased. I have not, however, thought it well to enlarge my area of evidence by quoting cases similar in kind to those already adduced.

† Medium, May 30th, 1873, p. 211. ‡ Spiritualist, January 2nd, 1874, p. 7.

Another case where the view of medium and psychic form seems to have been very distinct is recorded by Mr. G. H. Potts.* He was invited by John King to enter the cabinet for the purpose of seeing him and his medium together. He states that he stood by the side of John King, "his form and features distinctly visible by the light of the lamp that he held," and that he also saw clearly the recumbent figure of Williams in a corner of the cabinet. [1877.]

Respecting another medium, Mr. Eglinton, Captain James gives† a piece of testimony which is good in itself, though it has in recent days been transcended by more remarkable manifestations equally well attested. I do not attempt to give any idea of the wealth of evidence that is now public property respecting Mr. Eglinton's remarkable power as a psychic, because a connected narrative of his life as a medium is now being prepared, and will be in the hands of the public before the present records can be complete. I may, however, remind my readers that many attested records are to be found in the columns of "LIGHT," and refer them for more elaborate details to the volume which, as I write, is announced as in preparation.‡

Captain James's narrative, a typical one amongst many, relates to a sance held at Mrs. Woodforde's, on January 27th, 1876.

"The cabinet was a recess with a curtain suspended in front. The light was good. An old man appeared with furrowed face and white beard and hair, and clad in white drapery. . . . This figure, 'White Warrior,' who formerly came with Bastian, frequently appeared at the same time with the medium in full light. There could be no possible mistake about this, for we repeatedly saw the two figures side by side." During a portion of this duplicate manifestation Mr. Eglinton was quite conscious.

THE Revue Spirite translates in its September number the judicial investigation in the Court of Criminal Correction at St. Louis, as published in the Daily Globe Democrat, of Mr. and Mrs. Miller, mediums, on the charge of "taking from Johnson and Madden one dollar and a-half from each, to witness an exhibition of pretended materialised spirits." The court was crowded with sympathetic friends, who gave the fullest testimony in favour of the defendants' true mediumship. The charge was dismissed. The Revue calls especial attention to some portions of the evidence, of which the most striking was transferred to our own columns.

SCPTICISM.—Speaking of the negating effect of positive sceptical minds on spiritual manifestations, I may say that I have known many in whose atmosphere manifestations have been very indifferent or impossible. I used to sit with a medium, some years ago, whose sances were held in a room adjoining a bath-house which was frequented by one of his occasional visitors. In this gentleman's presence not a line could be obtained. Once I had been receiving communications freely, when the pencil which the medium was putting between two slates, suddenly flew from his fingers, and presently this sceptical gentleman walked in. His approach had been perceived by the medium's spirit-guides, while he was many rods from the house, and all manipulation of the pencil was arrested.—THOMAS R. HAZARD.

THE WESTERN SOCIETY FOR PSYCHICAL RESEARCH.—We have received a copy of the report of the First General Meeting of this Society, held at Chicago, June 30th. In its list of members we find the names of physicians (the President himself being President of the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Chicago), lawyers, scientists, clergymen, literary men, journalists, among whom is the editor of the Religio-Philosophical Journal. In the course of an excellent opening address the President said that a society also founded on the lines of the London Society for Psychical Research, had been a year in existence at Boston, of which many men eminent in the different professions are members. The Western Society has appointed working Committees on (1) Hypnotism, Clairvoyance, and Somnambulism; (2) Apparitions and Haunted Houses; (3) Physical Phenomena; and (4) Psychopathy, including Mind-Cure, Faith-Cure, Metaphysical-Cure, and Magnetic Healing.

The Society for Psychical Research and Madame Blavatsky.
To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Several months have elapsed since the Society for Psychical Research held a meeting at which Mr. Hodgson, anticipating the publication of a report then promised on the results of his visit to the headquarters of the Theosophical Society at Madras, made certain statements. He declared that, in his opinion, Madame Blavatsky had been guilty of perpetrating various frauds on the credulity of Theosophists and others in India, had actually written the letters imputed to her by the Christian College Magazine, had employed the so-called shrine as a conjurer's box, and had been the actual writer—assisted by confederates—of the letters I have received for several years, believing them to come from a Mahatma.

At the time, it appeared to me that the evidence Mr. Hodgson had collected in India, as far as this was foreshadowed in his speech, was worthless; his method of inquiry seemed to have been ill-judged, his unfamiliarity with Indian and Indian ways to have led him into many serious mistakes, his conclusions concerning the phenomena at Adyar to be incompatible with facts within my own knowledge, and his theory concerning the letters I had received,—very few of which, compared to the whole number, have ever been published or seen by Mr. Hodgson,—to be grotesquely untenable. I felt that an answer to a great deal that might be brought forward could be evolved from his own materials, and before this I should have endeavoured to prepare such an answer but that it seemed desirable to wait for Mr. Hodgson's report, so that the whole case might be dealt with once for all. Indeed, I understood that some private representations made to Mr. Hodgson by Theosophists since the meetings of June have been met by reference to the forthcoming report, as containing matter which would justify conclusions that might not have been adequately accounted for by the explanations put forward at the meeting.

But three months and a-half have elapsed since the meeting and that report has not yet appeared. It seems to me that the course which the authorities of the Society for Psychical Research have thus pursued is open to grave objection. A series of charges imputing misconduct of the blackest dye to Madame Blavatsky have been made public on the assumption that they would ultimately be supported by testimony. If this testimony was not ready for immediate production the announcement of Mr. Hodgson's conclusions ought equally to have been delayed. By the arrangement adopted Madame Blavatsky's reputation is deeply impugned, and her friends are paralysed in regard to the measures they would desire to take for her defence. For these measures can only have to do with an appeal to the reason of persons interested in the controversy of which she is the centre. However cruel, hasty, and unfounded are the attacks made upon her, a defence which involves the recognition of psychic phenomena can never be urged with success in courts of justice,—tribunals which are not yet sufficiently familiar with the occult side of Nature to entertain the possibility of occurrences transcending the experience of daily life. But to deal at length with Mr. Hodgson's forecast of his conclusions before having his report available for analysis would be to court the objection that we are criticising an investigation with the results of which we are unacquainted. To remain silent, on the other hand, is to encourage the profoundly erroneous belief that we, who by reason of our interest in Theosophy scrutinise the facts concerning Madame Blavatsky with attention, are overwhelmed by a conviction of her guilt.

For the moment, therefore, I can only turn to "LIGHT" as the principal organ of psychic discussion in this country, and ask you to make public my protest against the course that has been pursued by the Society for Psychical Research, and to allow me,—while postponing a fuller criticism of Mr. Hodgson's conclusions till the much-talked-of report is issued,—to make a few preliminary observations.

To begin with, it ought to be generally understood that never to this day has Madame Blavatsky been allowed to see the original letters alleged to be hers, so as to offer her own suggestions as to the manner in which they may have been produced, and yet Mr. Hodgson seems to have had these letters in his possession while still at Madras and in frequent intercourse with all persons at the headquarters of the Theosophical Society. I am unable to reconcile this incomprehensible neglect of what would seem to have been the first step he ought to have taken towards getting at the truth about the letters, with his assurance that he conducted his inquiry with an open mind. More than this, it appears to me that until the letters are shown to Madame Blavatsky, and until her comments on them, whatever these may be, are fairly taken into account and sifted, Mr. Hodgson is not entitled even to a hearing in regard to the inferences he may draw from the result of inquiries concerning the letters carried on behind Madame Blavatsky's back.

Anxious myself to sift the matter to the bottom I applied to the Society for Psychical Research about two months ago, for permission to take such of the letters as have been brought to this country to Madame Blavatsky myself, with the view of getting her explanations about them. But my request was refused on the ground that the present custodians of the letters were bound to return them to the Christian College Magazine.

Secondly, having during the past few weeks spent considerable time with Madame Blavatsky, and having minutely discussed with her all the circumstances of darkest suspicion concerning her, I have returned from these interviews entirely assured in my own mind of her innocence of the offences imputed to her by Mr. Hodgson. But pending the unfairly delayed publication of the promised report, it would be premature for me to go into details as to the grounds on which I regard the outrageous attack that has been made upon her as the result of blundering all long the line.

A. P. SINNETT.

"Facts and Theories."

SIR,—The position assumed by "C.C.M." in last week's "LIGHT" cannot be left unchallenged by those who think that the demand for "facts first and theories afterwards" is something more than "plausible," and is necessary and characteristic in "this inductive age;" yet for many reasons I would rather find myself in agreement with "C.C.M." as would also, I believe, most of the readers of "LIGHT." His wide experience and his erudition give to anything that he writes an authority to which few can pretend, and he is at all times a formidable opponent. But the position which he takes is a dangerous one. It is very metaphysical, and metaphysicians wield a dangerous weapon—a two-edged sword.

I grant the difficulty of getting facts accepted—and properly interpreted—by the untrained, without giving them theories to swallow them with; the difference between a scientific and an unscientific man here is precisely that the former is able to admit a fact or series of facts without the accompaniment of a set of more or less flimsy hypotheses. The "outside public"—for which Psychical Researchers have suddenly developed so great a respect—can be made to accept "tentative and provisional" hypotheses of the most outré kind, provided they are only put forward sufficiently ponderously by those who happen for the time to hold the public ear. To "give them a theory they can understand" on the plea that they will then "soon find the evidence to be satisfactory," seems to me to be doing permanent evil that temporary good may come. I venture to characterise such a process as unscientific. What happens when the bubble bursts? This must be its fate, and the theory-holder will either stick to his exploded theory or will get into a state of mental chaos and demoralisation at seeing it blown away with but little more trouble sometimes than was taken to put it together. We do not want people who will accept evidence on such immoral terms—we ought not to care about those who are incapable of grasping facts without such treatment as the foregoing. I should be glad, indeed, to find, with "C.C.M.," that people would not accept evidence to facts which are to them utterly unintelligible unless it be "personal and palpable" evidence. I am pleased—by the way—to see that "C.C.M." falls back upon "plain experience" to prove this point, a proceeding hardly in accordance with the rule of "theories first, facts afterwards"; and that further on he endeavours to support the latter proposition by saying that it is based on "common experience." The truly scientific man asks for scientific evidence, which consists firstly in the observation and the co-ordination of facts—of plain and common experiences—without reference to theories; he requires very different evidence to that which would satisfy "any court of justice in the world"—for courts of justice are easily satisfied, and he has no "antecedent presumption against the facts." It cannot be assumed that the nature and degree of the evidence usual in a court of justice are the best possible, and are to be taken as standards, any more than it can be assumed that the ordinary jurymen, by the mere fact of his function, is at all capable of "estimating human testimony at its ordinary value."

I cannot admit that because the conditions of a phenomenon are not known, or are known but imperfectly, and because we may not have the power to reproduce and exhibit it at will, the evidence of the occurrence of such a phenomenon is not scientific evidence. Surely there are enough and to spare of phenomena with the conditions of which we are unacquainted and of which we cannot command the reproduction. Is the observation, collection, and tabulation of these not to be considered as scientific work and as furnishing scientific evidence?

I fail altogether to see that "C.C.M.'s" proposition, "the form of intelligence is prior to its content," is at all equivalent to "theories first, facts afterwards," or to "facts follow thought." I take the first to mean that the form of intelligence common to humanity is capable only of the reception of certain impressions which it regards as facts, but which may have a totally different effect upon intelligences differently constituted. The way in which a fact will impress me, then, depends upon the form of my intelligence, but this peculiarity of appreciation is surely not the same thing as the making of a theory to account for the fact. If I see the sun rise, and have never seen it before, my mind registers the fact—I have no theory to account for the process beforehand. My mind takes the fact in a certain way, and the theory which I afterwards adopt may be due to the way in which the fact has impressed me, but the subsequent theory is no more identical with the peculiarity of appreciation than an effect is identical with its cause. Therefore, as it seems to me, facts do not follow thought, but thought follows facts. On the other hand, if "C.C.M." is going to adopt the position that everything is subjective, I have nothing to say. Then facts cease to exist, there is nothing but thought, and we may spend our time in the "hovers of boundless bliss" in speculating as to the reality of our own existence.

Spiritualists have certainly not all accepted their theory as a ready-made one inherited from the world's old tradition,—although the existence and persistence of that theory through all time as the only one capable of covering the facts observed, is a strong support to it. Many, I believe most, of those who may be regarded as the best of Spiritualists, have gained their conviction, in spite of themselves, in spite of the bias produced by education, surroundings, and inheritance, by the steady incidence of undeniable facts. The rule of "theories first, facts afterwards" has not been followed by these men any more than it has been followed by the few truly scientific men who have appeared in the world, and to whose work and methods we owe our present position. When men spent their time in theorising about what ought to be, instead of observing what was, stagnation and darkness were the results, but the new era came with men who, like Darwin, spent years in patiently collecting facts before venturing on theories—proceeding from the simple to the complex, a method which might be recommended with advantage to the Society for Psychical Research.

There are several other points in "C.C.M.'s" letter with which I should like to deal, and upon which I should be grateful for further explanation and development from him. I would merely remark, en passant, as regards Von Hartmann, that some of the writers in "LIGHT" will no doubt be able to give a good account of him and his "Scientific and Philosophical Categories," which it appears are not founded on any personal experimental knowledge; and finally to "C.C.M.'s" last sentence, regarding the intrinsic merits of the Psychical Society's theories, I would report that those who are responsible for them are evidently as yet unable to grasp the extraordinary contradictions and assumptions to which they have committed themselves, and which have led others as well as myself to "slight their importance" at the risk of being informed that we have made no effort to rise to that intellectual level which has produced "Telepathy" and "Unconscious Cerebration."

THYMOL.

"The General Credibility of Spiritualists as Witnesses."

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—The members of the W— circle are to be sincerely congratulated on their direct, manly, and straightforward letter. Spiritualists will await from such candid and impartial observers a report of their investigations with more than ordinary confidence.

The question of "the general credibility of Spiritualists as witnesses," which they shy at, is one which would deserve no second thought, were it not that its introduction into this discussion in any way whatever was singularly out of taste. Spiritualists as a body know more about the phenomena under notice than any other body of men. Their individual competence as witnesses depends on personal characteristics with which their critics are wholly unacquainted. Certainly, "nothing but the most general conclusions could be arrived at as to the moral and mental characteristics of so many persons." But why introduce this body of persons into the argument at all? Shall we, for instance, discuss the moral competency of men over 6ft. high to observe accurately what they see from that elevation? Or, shall we try to arrive at some conclusion as to the effects of obesity in persons over 14st. in weight on their capacity for observation?

If it was intended to imply that all Spiritualists are not competent observers, the insult may be allowed to pass amid laughter. If it was desired to convey the impression that the testimony of an avowed Spiritualist would invalidate evidence in the eyes of certain "outsiders," we may laugh at the candour and impartiality of the "outsider." But in any case the discussion is to be deprecated. "Outsiders" have no monopoly of candour and intelligence.

A SPIRITUALIST.

The Society for Psychical Research.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I beg to offer a few remarks on the letters of your correspondent "W. P.," in your issue of October 10th.

The spirit of factious egotism which imbues Spiritualists, in the opinion of your correspondent, has not been noticed by me up to the present time. I should have supposed it to be more rife among those who, by their neglect of opportunities the most favourable for investigating "so-called Spiritualistic phenomena," imply that the phenomena and the evidence of those who have investigated, are equally unworthy of attention.

Far be it from me to underrate the value of the Society for Psychical Research; but I beg to say that an investigation of phenomena occurring in the presence of such a medium as Mr. Eglinton would be worth more in every way than a record of an apparition or a prescient dream recorded twenty years after the occurrence.

Your correspondent states that we owe it to the Society that "we are no longer discussing phenomena, but the causes of those phenomena—their existence is admitted, their meaning alone is in dispute."

I have yet to learn that the phenomena known as "slate-writing," and "materialisation," both occurring to a remarkable degree in Mr. Eglinton's presence, have been discussed; at any rate no attempt at explanation has reached me. "Telepathy, undoubtedly, does not cover all the ground" is the remark of your correspondent, and in this I cordially agree with him.—Yours truly,

October 10th, 1885.

A MEMBER OF THE S.P.R.

The W— Seances, &c.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Permit me to thank the members of this circle for their frank and manly letter with reference to Mr. Eglinton and myself. It was only as a foil to the insult offered to Spiritualists on the part of one who was absent on the occasion in question, that I felt it my duty to ask for such a statement from those who were present. I can now rest assured that the promised report will be speedily forthcoming.

As regards the communication upon which I commented in my "Open Letter," is judgment to go by default? This I cannot allow without an effort to remove the difficulty which I am informed my correspondent experiences in replying. I accept all responsibility for my action in that matter; I also maintain that I was perfectly justified, under the circumstances, in departing from a strictly purist view of what is or what is not a private communication, or how far publicity was given by its insertion in "LIGHT," and I shall be quite content to stand by a letter in which I explained my reasons for so acting. That letter I am quite willing he should publish, and in that case I fail to see any difficulty in the way of his meeting the case against him. I should be extremely sorry to believe he will thus tacitly admit the justice of my remarks.—Yours truly,

RECORDS OF PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

[In this column will be given from time to time such accounts of psychical phenomena as seem to be worthy of permanent record. Beyond the general classification indicated, no attempt at tabulation will at present be made; that work will follow in due course. In furtherance of this object we shall be pleased to receive from our readers brief reports of phenomena subject to two conditions. (1) That a colourless statement of facts without comment is given; and (2) that communications are accompanied by the names and addresses of those concerned, not necessarily for publication, though we should naturally prefer to be at liberty to publish them. Amongst the phenomena referred to may be mentioned:—

CLASS O.—PSYCHOGRAPHY.

On Tuesday, September 29th, 1885, at 12 a.m., I, in company with Mr. J. G. Keulemans, attended at 6, Nottingham-place, for the purpose of conducting experiments in psychography with Mr. W. Eglinton. The séance commenced at 12.15 a.m., and terminated at 12.55 a.m.

In reference to an inquiry, Mr. Eglinton cordially agreed that, as far as he was concerned, we should conduct our experiments in our own manner. I had not previously mentioned my proposed course of action to any one.

It was to obtain psychography in four different colours in a rotation unknown to the medium, the particular words to be chosen at random from a book unknown to all present.

The number of a page in the book from which I wished certain words in a given line to be transcribed on the slate by psychography I chose in the following manner. I took a piece of money at random from my pocket out of fourteen coins then in my possession. The last two figures of the date I wrote down on a slate, secretly to Mr. Eglinton and Mr. Keule-mans. A similar result, i.e., the last figure of the date on another coin, written down secretly as before on my slate, was to indicate the number of the line. Four words in the line having to be transcribed, I also wrote down secretly their numbers, placing the slate, on which I had written, face downwards on the table.

I then asked Mr. Keulemans to select a book haphazard from a bookcase in the room, containing upwards of 150 volumes. I requested him not to look at the title or in any way to seek to discover its contents, or to so place it, when selected, as to reveal its nature either to Mr. Eglinton or myself. My instructions were faithfully followed, and not until the end of the experiment did either of those visibly present know what the book was. To make assurance doubly sure Mr. Keulemans chose a volume without any title lettered on its back.

As I desired to obtain four lines of psychography in as many different colours I then requested Mr. Keulemans to decide this point and to write down secretly on a slate the names of the four colours chosen in the order in which he wished them used. This was done, and the slate upon which he had written these details placed face downwards on the table. Neither Mr. Eglinton nor myself touched this slate until the end of the séance.

My next proceeding was to request Mr. Keulemans to decide whether the words I had chosen should be counted forwards or backwards, i.e., from the beginning of the line or from the end. This he did, electing that they should be counted from the commencement. It should be noted:—

- (1) That the title or character of the book chosen at random was unknown to all the persons visibly present.
- (2) Mr. Keulemans selected the four colours from a number lying on the table.
- (3) The order in which these were to be used was known only to Mr. Keulemans.
- (4) The numbers of the page and line chosen by chance from which I desired four particular words transcribed, and the numbers of the particular words, were known only to myself.
- (5) Mr. Eglinton knew nothing (a) of the title or character of the book; (b) of the order of the colours; (c) of the number of page; (d) of the number of the line, and (e) of the numbers of the particular words in that line.
- (6) Not any of these details were decided upon until immediately preceding the experiment.

These preliminaries completed, Mr. Eglinton took another slate, which was cleaned and examined by Mr. Keulemans and myself. It was destitute of writing or marks on either side. Upon the upper face of this slate were placed the four crayons. Upon these, and completely covering them from view, was put the book. So arranged, the slate was then held by Mr. Eglinton's right hand just under the edge of the table, his left hand being all the time firmly grasped in my left, and both Mr. Keulemans' hands being placed in my right hand. I closely scrutinised what took place. At no time was the slate resting on Mr. Eglinton's knees, nor was there any support for a slate on the under surface of the table.

I then inquired of Mr. Eglinton's invisible co-workers, presumed present, whether the experiment was satisfactory to themselves; also whether we were likely to be successful. Mr. Keulemans desired aloud that the reply should be written in white, that being one of the four colours then on the slate. We shortly heard the sound of writing, the completion of the message being indicated by the customary three raps with the pencil on the slate.

On examination we found the book and the four crayons as we had placed them, but on the slate under the book, written with the white crayon that had been placed on the slate, were the words, "We will try."

Another slate, with the book and crayons similarly arranged, was returned and held in the position previously stated. After the lapse of some minutes writing was again heard, ultimately followed by three taps.

On examination we found written on the top surface of the slate (and of course under the book) the words:—

- | | | | |
|-----|------------|----|--------|
| (1) | "Enforced" | in | White. |
| (2) | "This" | in | Blue. |
| (3) | "Here" | in | Red. |
| (4) | "Must" | in | Grey. |

The crayons in each case rested at the end of the word written in the respective colours.

The slates upon which Mr. Keulemans and myself had written the directions were now, for the first time, turned up. The order of the colours chosen and written down by Mr. Keulemans was found to be—1st, white; 2nd, blue; 3rd, red; and 4th, grey. The number of the page written down by myself was the sixty-first, and the particular words chosen for transcription from the fourth line were the sixth, the fifth, the first and the third word respectively.

On turning to the fourth line of the sixty-first page of the book—which turned out to be Crookes' "Researches"—it ran as follows:—

"Here I must bring this enforced vindication to a close." The sixth, the fifth, the first, and the third words of which are as written on the slate. The experiment had been perfectly successful.

Another experiment was then tried. Mr. Keulemans took another slate, and drew upon it a parallelogram. This he divided into two equal squares. In one he drew an owl's head, and requested that the sketch should be copied in the blank square. A piece of grey crayon was put on the slate, which was held under the table in the usual way, and in a few seconds, on being withdrawn, this had been accomplished, with the addition of the words "I am not an artist, as you see. Good-bye; God bless you." The séance then terminated.

The above account of this most successful séance is perfectly correct.

34, Matilda-street, Barnsbury. J. G. KEULEMANS.

P.S.—Although I had requested to have the colours used in a certain rotation, I had, at the moment Mr. Eglinton held the slates, quite forgotten how they were to follow, except that white was to come first.—J. G. K.

[Apropos of this truly remarkable séance it may be interesting and instructive to our readers if they will compare the various theories which may be broached to explain it and its congeners:—

1. A disembodied spirit was able to perceive, either in the minds or clairvoyantly upon the slates of the experimenters, the complex method by which the particular words were to be selected. It was able to perceive clairvoyantly the words themselves. And it was able to use a force, derived from the medium, whereby to write the words.

2. The complex method aforesaid was conveyed in toto to the unconscious mind of the medium by thought-transference. The unconscious mind of the medium, either from the stores of latent memory or by clairvoyance, was able to perceive the particular words required, and it was able by using the force of the medium to write the words.

The difference between these two theories is so little as far as our argument is concerned, that if one be true the other may also be true.

3. The complex method was conveyed by thought-transference to the conscious mind of the medium. He then with a sort of "divine dexterity" managed to overcome all obstacles, and to write himself the words required.

In this case, however, the direct statements of Mr. Farmer as to the way in which the slate with the book and pencils on it was held beneath the table, puts altogether out of court any theory of fraud on the part of the medium.

4. There was no thought-transference and no psychography. Mr. Farmer and Mr. Keulemans, both well-known to our readers as men whose only crime is that they are Spiritualists, have deliberately concocted this account after, perhaps, going through the mockery of an experiment.

Either 1 and 2, that is, psychography, must be true; or 4 must be true; and the writers of this account must be charged with fraud. We cannot permit the sceptic to go halting off with lame excuses to seek a via media in (3).

Let us narrow the issue, turn the tables, and bring the investigators to book.]

CLASS M.—KNOCKINGS AND RAPPINGS.

Allow me to contribute the following short account of a séance held on Sunday evening, September 20th, as an addition, under heading "M.," to your "Records of Psychical Phenomena."

The manifestations which occurred were not startling in character, but are, I think, worthy of notice for their distinctness and simplicity. We were sitting round the table, in a room on the ground floor, below which no apartments exist. We kept a candle burning the whole time, and everyone's hands rested on the table, separate at first, but subsequently joined to those of their neighbours. After a few minutes, faint knocks were heard on the table; these soon became stronger, and succeeded, with some difficulty in spelling out a short message by means of the alphabet in the usual way. I say "with some difficulty" because after every two or three letters were indicated a pause occurred as if the power to produce knocks was for the time expended. The knocks were produced on the table, on the floor in various parts of the room, and once on the top of the piano, which was immediately behind my chair, and quite out of reach of anyone; they were of varying emphasis, and always occurred in answer to questions asked in a low tone of voice.

After the message was completed, a pause, longer than usual, occurred, during which the person through whose mediumship the manifestations were taking place said he felt that "the influence" had changed. This was confirmed, on the question being asked, by very loud raps on the floor. The power being now seemingly stronger, we got a piece of string, and passed it through a sheet of note-paper near the edge; the string was held "taut" by two persons at opposite sides of the table, and the suspended paper was placed midway between them. In this position, in answer to a request that such should be, taps were made on the paper and heard by me; the taps were of such a nature that, to the best of my knowledge and belief, they could not have been caused by any ordinary movement of the paper or string. The number of taps on the paper corresponded in every case with the number asked for, thus indicating, in this instance also, the intelligence of the operator. I was not myself able to count the number of taps each time, but the three people nearest the paper agreed that they always thus corresponded. After this all indications of occult power ceased.

[We think it well to publish this case as it stands; though we hope to obtain more evidence ourselves. Some of our readers may now be able to assist us. It is just one of those cases which make us regret the non-existence of some practical investigating society of Spiritualists, with resources which might be applied to inquiries on the spot. We give first an account, strongly tinged as it is with the sceptical bias, from the Somerset County Herald of May 2nd, 1885.]

REMARKABLE SPIRITUALISTIC DEMONSTRATIONS. — During the past few days considerable excitement has been caused among the inhabitants of King-street and the neighbourhood, by what has been termed "a visit from an evil spirit," with which a family residing in that street allege they have been favoured. They stated on Saturday last that they heard some unaccountable noises proceeding from one of the bedrooms of their residence, which they believed betokened the approach of the "evil one," and they were not slow to communicate their fears to their neighbours, and as the rumour obtained currency, a considerable number of persons hastened to the scene of the mysterious occurrence. They were invited by the victims, who consisted of a man, woman and a girl, to enter the house and witness the manifestations for themselves. Many persons availed themselves of this invitation, and the Spiritualistic mania gradually taking possession of them, they freely confessed to hearing peculiar noises, as though articles of furniture were being knocked by a stick. The affair continued to cause an amount of animation in the neighbourhood, and during Sunday several hundred persons visited King-street, while Acting-Sergeant Brown and Police-constables Richardson and Bartram also proceeded to the scene of the "spirit's" demonstrations. The "spirit" evidently did not appreciate the interference of the protectors of the peace, for although the manifestations were in full swing when they entered the house, on Sergeant Brown's requesting the girl who occupied the chair to which the "spirit" was confining its attention to vacate it and remove her boots, the noise suddenly ceased. Doubtless had the worthy sergeant and his colleagues remained in the house, very little more would have been heard of the Spiritualistic manifestations, but as they quitted it the tapping was resumed. Several of the more credulous of the neighbours seemed to have entertained the opinion that the appearance of the "evil one" had been evoked by some wicked act on the part of the girl who resided in the house, and they urged her to confess her guilt in order that the wrath of the spirit might be assuaged. This, however, the girl, perhaps wisely, refrained from doing, as by so doing the whole proceedings might have come to an end. Subsequently, it was thought that religious intervention might prove of some avail in solving the mystery, and consequently two "happy" members of the local "mission" appeared on the scene, and they consented to pray for the removal of the supposed evil one from the unhappy girl. Their attempted exorcism, however, proved of no avail, for on Monday the girl alleged that she was unable to remain seated in a chair, being violently thrown about by invisible agencies. The woman was also said to be affected by the evil one, but the man has as yet escaped its machinations. On Monday morning the girl fastened a prayer-book around her neck, and this for a time she stated prevented the spirit tormenting her. The affair continues to create considerable excitement, a large crowd having assembled in the neighbourhood on Monday evening, and did not disperse for a considerable time. Various and amusing are the reasons assigned for the manifestations, and it is indeed surprising that in this "enlightened nineteenth century" there should be found people credulous enough to entertain such absurd fancies, which are sure to turn out a silly hoax.

[We learnt that the mission referred to was the Taunton Gospel Mission, and we obtained the name and address of one of the members mentioned as having been present at the knockings, which we retain private, but who is known as "Happy Albert." We have received from him the following interesting letter, which throws quite a different complexion on the affair.]

October 5th, 1885.

In reference to the King-street affair of May last, I will give you as true an account as I can, as I found it myself. The little mission-room I have laboured in for over two years is about two minutes' walk from King-street. It was Sunday evening, between eight and nine o'clock, when I was called out of the meeting and asked to go and see a young woman who could not find peace indoors or out. I at once left the meeting in my colleague's hands and went. Arriving at King-street, to my surprise, I found about 300 people assembled. I was pointed out the young woman surrounded by about six men trying to hold her. She seemed to me like one mad, in a most pitiful condition. I at once helped her indoors. It was distressing to see her. The knockings continued all the time I was present. I was always most sceptical about these things before. But I must confess I really believe an evil spirit or something I could not see harassed the girl. If she sat on a chair the knocking could be heard under it. I asked her to let me sit in her chair and she sat in my place. She did so. The knocking went to her chair. If she stood by the table, it was just the same. Or, standing away from anything, it would then catch hold of her. There were also about twelve more present besides myself who were very much alarmed. I held a service with them, singing. Prayer was offered by myself and Mr. Peart. We spoke to those present about their souls' eternal welfare. Strong men wept like children. But as soon as the service was ended the knocking continued. I left there about 10.30. The next day the young woman was taken to her parents' home, about two miles from Taunton. I have heard since that she is quite herself again.—I remain, yours truly, in God's work,

CLASS E.—PREVISION.

In the summer of 1873, I resided at London, Ontario, Canada, my house being on the Hamilton-road, near Adelaide-street, about ten minutes' walk from my work. I was a carpenter in an iron foundry. I went to bed at nine o'clock. Just before dark I was suddenly aroused from a half-sleeping condition by the whisper of "Fire, fire, fire." I called to my wife to go into the garden, and looked all round for fire, but she could discover nothing.

Next morning when I arrived at the workshop, I found to my surprise a hole burnt through the roof just over where my tool-chest stood. And on inquiries I found that while running the blast furnace just after 9 p.m., the night before, sparks from the "cupilo" had set fire to the roof, being the exact time that I had been disturbed by the whisper of "fire" in my ears.

REVIEW.

THE MOTHER: THE WOMAN CLOTHED WITH THE SUN.*

This volume, which may be chosen as a well-marked specimen of its class, exceeds in its pretensions all that have hitherto appeared:—and these are not few—in the same line. Such histories of mediumship are likely to mislead those who take them literally, and as they are so taken by many readers they are worth examination, always supposing them to be written in good faith. As this book shows many of the features of a true development of mediumship, we must suppose it genuine, although doubts may arise as to whether the source of the inspiration is a good one; for the aspiring lady who calls herself "The Mother" claims to be not only, like St. Catherine of Sienna, or her humbler rival Joanna Southcott, the Spouse of Christ, but a superhuman being, the Divine Mother, the feminine half of the bi-une God. The author's name is not given, but the book is written by a gentleman who calls himself "The Recorder," and who tells how, in the year 1877, a lady, accompanied by two younger ones, came to his house. As he had been reduced in circumstances and let apartments, we may suppose the three were lodgers. He had been in the habit of attending séances, but the spiritual gifts made known through this lady were so far in advance of anything which had yet come to his knowledge that he at once accepted them as being of a different kind and far higher character. It is likely that this writer may not have had any other opportunity of watching the development of a mediumship from its commencement, but readers who have seen this will perceive that the case is not an uncommon one, except inasmuch as the teaching has been misapprehended. The automatic writing and drawing, and the sort of symbol used to illustrate the messages are just like what most old Spiritualists will recognise as among their earliest and simplest experiences. They are for the most part inferior to the work of some of our most enlightened, but least assuming mediums. But for both drawing and writing we are referred to the Bible for confirmation of what is well-known, that both were forms in which revelations from the higher world were formerly made.

After these manifestations had gone on for some time under "The Recorder's" notice, "The Mother's" true nature and history were disclosed. She was born on the 25th December, in a wayside inn at the foot of St. Michael's Mount. Her mother was travelling, and the infant, unprovided for and unwelcome, "was laid aside in a basket of straw." The mother afterwards, on her death-bed, solemnly declared that the child had no human father. But "she grew up surrounded by luxury, and in the midst of the highest society," &c., until having passed through many troubles, of which one was an unhappy marriage, "she fell into the hands of some fiend-inspired people, by whom she was systematically and continuously poisoned for eight whole years!" But she was saved by a miracle.

After this, and much more, the whole being made startling and impressive by varieties of type, her reception of spiritual influx (or mediumship) takes place. We are not told how it first showed itself, but she had attended many séances, and was not satisfied with the result. And, like other mediums, she is assured at the outset that her mission is one of incalculable importance, more so than any yet given, not excepting that of Christ. The following message, given March 25th, 1879, will show her pretensions.

"Message, 25th March, A.D. 1879.

"THE MOTHER'S DAY.

"For the Holy Mother,—God, the All Holy Jehovah, is the Father of all, but He is your Father in an especial manner, having created and evolved you out of Himself, and given you to the earth at this juncture, for your special mission, to show forth the Glory of the Two-in-One!!!"

"This is a mystery before which the angels veil their faces.

"On April 9th, of the year of the Lord 1879, the day of unveiling and revelation of the Mother Queen in the spirit-world, ancient Magi, Hindoos, and Hebrews returned to earth, accept and do homage representatively to the Queen in our house, kneeling in lowly reverence and adoring love, and kissing the hem of her garment. They will carry far the glad tidings. The Divine Mother is to be revealed to all sections of her family, in both worlds, as they can bear.

"Similar reverent and loving homage was previously paid by the saints of the Catholic Church; some of the chief of whom, as St. Catherine and St. Theresa, had been privileged to be among her constant attendants and companions before her unveiling to them and to herself."

* London: Field and Tuer, 2s. 6d. May be obtained of the Psychological Press, 16, Craven-street, Strand.

The following message is delivered to "The Queen" on the same day:—

"The mystery is now unveiled to us through your obedience.—"

"Five days will there come over your spirit the mighty rushes of your Divine Nature, only to be regulated by your letting it flow forth in the outlet provided for you by the All Holy. Then comes the Glory to be unveiled."—"

The signatures (three asterisks) are declared to be "the signatures of the Heavenly Archangels."

Many of us, I believe, know the signification of references to Egypt in spiritual communications. We have but to look through any narrative of a progressive development of mediumship to find "The Place of Egypt in Universal (Spiritual) History." So, some time before the first unveiling, "The Queen receives a message from the 'Egyptian Sages of the Mystic Altar of the Temple of Sun,' in which she is told that 'in the Easter dawn of the year was she to be unveiled unto two or three chosen,' and 'the Angels have announced to us the glad tidings of The Two-in-One.'"

These pretensions are like those of many other inspired persons, who take the symbol for the spiritual truth, and mistake expressions which apply to that truth as having been used to themselves individually. I do not for a moment deny the right of all the different claimants to be "Spouses of Christ." St. Catherine, who was "privileged to be the Mother's constant attendant and companion," had been married with a ring long before. But it is in the sense that they all share that reception of the Spirit which was shown to John in the vision of the New Jerusalem or the Bride. And this symbol embodies an universal truth, referring, not to separate individuals, but to the effect of that out-pouring of Spirit described by Christ as His second coming, and indicating a higher condition of the race.

There are abundant signs of this outpouring at present. It brings the special message needed at this time, and for which the time is ready; namely, that throughout every degree of life the male and female, being essentially one, are equal, and having each different and complementary elements are indispensable to each other's existence. They are out of place now relatively to each other, but the coming Evangel will rectify the dislocation.

No wonder that a principle so fraught with weighty meaning and involving such complicated results, should be misunderstood and misapplied by those who have only as yet a glimpse of its meaning, and who do not half recognise its reality. When it is well understood and acknowledged, that tangled knot, the "woman question," will be untied, with many other social problems which now seem to defy explanation. In the meantime every kind of mistake must arise. Those to whom the truth is spiritually entrusted (is anything given not spiritually?) cannot receive it in all its breadth, for they are human, and their powers of reception and transmission are limited. But each one who can receive and transmit at all, i.e., who is what is called a medium, has his or her portion of the message,* and none can pass it on quite intact, for it must be limited, more or less, by the human personality.

We have had many books containing announcements like that of the one under consideration, and we shall have many more, all varying in outward form and expression with the dispositions and capacities of the transmitters. One of these, "The Two-in-One," by T. L. Harris, touches on the mystery of the Heavenly Marriage in a different way from "The Mother." "Sympneumata," so far as I understand it, is based on the same truth,† and a writer, signed "C. A. P.," in the New Church Independent, goes farther into details than any of the others. Each writer probably has something to convey which is wanting to the rest; but each and all seem to think it due to their high calling to disclaim all connection with "so-called Spiritualism" and Spiritualists. If Spiritualists, as a body, had ever laid down any conditions of belief or non-belief to which they required assent, there might be some reason for this disclaimer. As it is we are reminded of the Pharisees, who prided themselves on their belief in angels, spirits, and the resurrection of the dead, yet were fierce in their denunciation of those who could attest the reality of experiences which would confirm the possibility of such facts, and make them better understood.

All that Spiritualism implies is a conviction of the reality of a certain class of phenomena disbelieved in by most educated persons, and generally ignored by the scientific world. Most of us, having this conviction, hope that the comprehension of these facts will lead to a higher knowledge than has as yet been attained. And one branch of this knowledge will be that of the nature and limitations of inspiration, and the value of the symbol in which every truth is conveyed.

* The Hebrew Prophets called it a "burthen."

† This may be a mistake. There are many things "hard to comprehend" in "Sympneumata."

Another direction in which intelligence may be expected to come with spiritual light into the world will be a clearer perception of the nature and causes of insanity. Many of our most enlightened recipients of the Spirit have held that lunacy is generally, if not always, accompanied by possession; and a careful observation of the character of different mediumships will enable us to discover where the work of the true and holy influence, known as inspiration, ceases, and that of the lower spirits, known as obsession and possession, begins.

To learn this we must have, first, a complete understanding* of the functions of the brain, and their manifestation in action, and feeling, in health. Secondly, the development of mediumship in each case, and its characteristics with reference to the medium's individual character. Thirdly, the conditions of brain, either from disease or disproportion of parts, which are favourable to the admission of spirits of the earth-tending class.

As far as I have seen there is much resemblance between some mediumships and cases of insanity; indeed, they have been known to show so many features in common that the possession of one has more than once been made a pretext for an imputation of the other. The symptoms most usually taken hold of when it is wished to prove a mediumistic person insane are the seeing and talking with spirits, and the automatic writing and drawing. But we know that these circumstances do not prove a man or woman mad. Persons having the best-balanced minds, and the highest and purest moral natures, have often the faculty of mediumship in an unusual degree; as, for example, Oberlin, the leaders of the Covenants, and many hard-working, pious men and women, whose whole lives have been under holy guidance. We shall find, I believe, that every variety of inspiration depends on, and is determined by, the character of the recipient, as indicated by the brain. Thus, if the attraction for duty and goodness is much stronger than that for selfishness or vice in an individual, the character of his mediumship will be high and holy, for it will be used by the good spirits who are in sympathy with, or near to, the receiver. Extending the application of this idea to all mediumships we find an infinite variety, ranging upwards to the holy saint or martyr, and downwards through a long series of poorly-organised beings to the sensitive, whose pride, cruelty, or animalism makes him or her the ready recipient of evil, earth-tending influences. According to the channel through which it comes the message will be either a true and trustworthy one, received with joy and transmitted intact, or it will be a false statement of earthly matters, or a vitiated version of a spiritual message.

There seems to be some analogy between the poor lunatic who fancies himself a King or an Emperor, and the medium who is "clothed with the sun." But the cases are in some respects different. The madman believes himself to be a King, and dresses the part, and acts according to his idea of it. But the ambitious lady, "before whom Angels and Archangels bow," has mistaken the meaning of her message, and identified herself with the truth she has to convey. In one sense, perhaps, the difference is one of degree; but the question of "how much" is an exceedingly difficult and complicated one, and the pursuit of it would lead me farther than I could follow. The simplest cases, both of mediumship and insanity, are often found among the inmates of a lunatic asylum, and a careful study of these might help us to discover the point at which real brain disease begins, and whether, and how far, it is accompanied in each case by mediumship or by possession.

And the Science of the future, which we may hope will deal more with the internal or real, and less with the external or phenomenal, than the Science of to-day, will find all these questions complicated and difficult in the degree that their solutions will enlighten and ennoble the race.

WITCHCRAFT AND THE WATER-ORDEAL.

By CARL DU PREL,

Author of "The Philosophy of Mysticism."

(Condensed from Dr. Rohner's Translation from the German in the Harbinger of Light of July and August.)

I.

Nations believed for centuries in witchcraft, and in the rationality of treating it by drowning and burning.

How came it that the most prominent men of the Middle Ages were under the delusion of seeing things which scientific men of the present age aver could never have been? This problem is not solved by saying that such men were ignorant or besotted; nor is it solved by calling witchcraft a fungus growth of the Romish Church, for witches were in Protestant as well as Roman Catholic countries.

Every age looks at the objective events of the preceding through its own subjective spectacles. Whatever it looks at through them which does not square with its own scientific view it puts aside either as not having existed at all, or as having lost its proper original significance.

In the Middle Ages it was believed that witches could not sink in water, and to establish the charge of being one, the accused was subjected to the water-ordeal.

This water-ordeal seems to be of Aryan origin, for in the laws of Manu it is laid down that those were to be believed or not believed who, on swearing, sink or floated in water; and the Saikhya doctrine taught that the Yogees or Fakirs floated in and even walked on water.

Jamblichus, the Neo-Platonist, says that those who were seized of the Divine Spirit were enabled to walk over burning coals or across rivers.

Pliny tells of a belief among the Scythians that those who had the "evil eye" could not be drowned. He also says that the Thibians did not sink in water.

Plutarch calls the Thibians sorcerers. He says, also, that the people of Pontus, reputed sorcerers, showed, in a high degree, lightness in water.

Those ancient notions about witchcraft and sorcery got confused together in the minds of men in the Middle Ages; and then, by an easy transition, those stigmatised by the Church as infidels were mixed up and confounded with them, and were subjected to the same treatment.

The Manichæans of Soissons were subjected, as infidels, to the water-ordeal. It is said that their chief, Clementius, floated like a log of wood.

The Albigenes were said to be able to walk on the water. St. Bernard says the same of other sects. Their trials by the water-ordeal were preceded by exorcism, until, in 1215, the Lateran Council decreed the ordeal without the exorcism.

The practice fell gradually into disuse until 1460, when there was a revival of it against those charged with sorcery and witchcraft throughout Europe.

In the "Witch Hammer" allusion is made to a phenomenon not mentioned before; it is there said that some witches were condemned to the stake, but in the sentence upon them it was provided that if the flames took no effect upon them they were to be drowned.

So it went on for centuries. In England during the Long Parliament, one Hopkins travelled through the country as Inquisitor, employing the water-ordeal. He caused sixty persons to be hanged in one year. It is on record that during that Parliament there were three thousand executions for witchcraft. Hopkins himself was at last taken in hand by some influential person and subjected to the ordeal; not sinking, he was hung.

It is also related that many, in order to clear themselves from the aspersion of sorcery, went before magistrates demanding to be put through the ordeal, and that some of them did not sink in spite of their efforts to do so.

Trials by water-ordeal did not cease in England until 1776.

In presence of such records of this phenomenon, presented by certain individuals, in all times and in various parts, of floating in water, one cannot evade the conviction that there must be in them a substratum of truth.

Turning to ecclesiastical records, we find that the property of floating in water was attributed to those said by the Church to be "possessed." In the Acta Sanctorum it is recorded that a woman "possessed of a devil" was taken to the tomb of St.

Umar and put into a tub of holy water, and that when the exorcism was pronounced her body was forced out of the tub in spite of the most forcible resistance by the priests.

But the ecclesiastical view of the subject becomes complicated when the notion of sanctity is mixed up with the phenomenon, as it is in the records, by St. Matthew, of Jesus Christ and St. Peter walking on the water.

St. Gregory writes that Maurus, "going into the river at command of his religious superior, to rescue a drowning boy, did not sink in the water, and brought the boy in safety to the bank." It would seem that he had been taken with a sudden trance, for St. Gregory adds, "When Maurus recovered himself he was terrified at what he found he had done."

It is clear that our predecessors regarded the phenomenon of not sinking in water as a fact; and it is a fact which cannot be explained away by modern materialistic methods.

In the water-ordeal the subjects were thrown into the water with their arms crossed and hands and feet bound together, men on either side holding the ends of a rope fastened round the subject, to pull them out should they sink. Three trials were thus made; those who sank at each were set free as innocent, while those who floated were held to be guilty, according to sex, of witchcraft or of sorcery.

SOMNAMBULISM.—A case is reported from Tamore, Co. Waterford. A young tourist engaged a room at a small hotel near the railway station, and retired. At three o'clock the same night stragglers saw a man in his night-dress drop from the sill of a window four or five yards to the ground. The fall did not seem to affect him. He walked into the town, when, returning to ordinary consciousness, he found himself near the police barracks, and there, upon his report, was furnished with refreshment and some clothing and then taken to his hotel, where the officer found he had good luggage and valuables.—Newcastle Daily Chronicle.

Mrs. CORA L. V. RICHMOND'S CLOSING MEETING AT THE ASSEMBLY ROOM, KENSINGTON.—Next Sunday evening will be the last opportunity the friends of Mrs. Richmond will have of seeing her and her husband and bidding them "Good-bye," as they leave London on Monday to take the steamer on Tuesday, October 20th. The guides of Mrs. Richmond will then say a few words suitable to the closing of the discourses for the present season. The guides of Mrs. Richmond and their medium desire to thank the friends in the provinces and suburban towns of London for invitations to deliver addresses, which could not be accepted owing to engagements and limited time. Mrs. Richmond's work during the summer just past has been arduous. There have been about forty-five public and thirty private meetings and receptions, besides other labours, in a little over five months.

CHURCHYARDS IN SCOTLAND, though attached to the churches, are not consecrated; they belong to the nation, and in them any burial may be made, with or without rites. Religious ceremonies at internments are unusual, except among Roman Catholics and Protestant Episcopalians, and neither of these are very numerous. There are no rector's fees and no rector's interference with respect to times and breakings of the ground. There is something to be paid; but it is a moderate charge for the grave digging, ten shillings or a little more. A religious disturbance in a graveyard was never heard of in Scotland till recently, when an old lady had a grave opened in one near Glasgow, in which to bury a favourite cat; but a crowd made an irruption with the cry that it was a shame to bury a cat like a Christian. The coffin was smashed, and the services of the police had to be requisitioned to disperse the excited people. They thought that in the matter of freedom of burial, a line ought to be drawn at animals.—Echo.

IS THERE A SIXTH SENSE?—A writer in the Toronto Mail narrates a remarkable instance of the appearance of the spirit immediately after dissolution. He says: "I have read with the greatest interest your articles on the sixth sense question, especially the last one in which you explain the Indian theory of apparitions. I frankly avow that I am more than half inclined to accept it as the true solution of many mysteries. Some years ago—to be more particular, it was at 5 p. m. on the evening of June 11th, 1877—I saw the figure of my brother standing close to me, his face towards mine. He or it was dressed in ordinary clothes. The face was singularly pale. He motioned to me, smiled, and then vanished. I was in my library at the time. It was broad daylight, of course, and the figure appeared near the window. I was not asleep or dreaming, but as wide awake as I am at this moment. I at once mentioned the matter to my wife, to her sister, and to three neighbours, all of whom are still alive. We noted the exact hour of the apparition, and, allowing for difference in time, it was the exact hour of my brother's death at Carlisle, England. He died very suddenly. I had not been thinking of him on the day referred to, nor for several days previously, for on May 20th we had received a letter from him stating that he was well (he was a robust man), and that he should sail for Canada on July 2nd. Will some of your scientific readers explain this apparition? The Indian theory explains it readily."

WHAT IS SAID OF PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

J. H. FICHTE, THE GERMAN PHILOSOPHER AND AUTHOR.—"Notwithstanding my age (83) and my exemption from the controversies of the day, I feel it my duty to bear testimony to the great fact of Spiritualism. No one should keep silent."

PROFESSOR DE MORGAN, PRESIDENT OF THE MATHEMATICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.—"I am perfectly convinced that I have both seen and heard, in a manner which should make unbelief impossible, things called spiritual, which cannot be taken by a rational being to be capable of explanation by imposture, coincidence, or mistake. So far I feel the ground firm under me."

DR. ROBERT CHAMBERS.—"I have for many years known that these phenomena are real, as distinguished from impostures; and it is not of yesterday that I concluded they were calculated to explain much that has been doubtful in the past; and, when fully accepted, revolutionise the whole frame of human opinion on many important matters."—Extract from a Letter to A. Russell Wallace.

PROFESSOR HARE, EMERITUS PROFESSOR OF CHEMISTRY IN THE UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA.—"Far from abating my confidence in the inferences respecting the agencies of the spirits of deceased mortals, in the manifestations of which I have given an account in my work, I have, within the last nine months" (this was written in 1883), "had more striking evidences of that agency than those given in the work in question."

PROFESSOR CHALLIS, THE LATE PLUMERIAN PROFESSOR OF ASTRONOMY AT CAMBRIDGE.—"I have been unable to resist the large amount of testimony to such facts, which has come from many independent sources, and from a vast number of witnesses. . . . In short, the testimony has been so abundant and contemporaneous, that either the facts must be admitted to be such as are reported, or the possibility of certifying facts by human testimony must be given up."—Clerical Journal, June, 1862.

PROFESSOR GREGORY, F.R.S.E.—"The essential question is this. What are the proofs of the agency of departed spirits? Although I cannot say that I yet feel the sure and firm conviction on this point which I feel on some others, I am bound to say that the higher phenomena, recorded by so many truthful and honourable men, appear to me to render the spiritual hypothesis almost certain. . . . I believe that if I could myself see the higher phenomena alluded to I should be satisfied, as are all those who have had the best means of judging of the truth of the spiritual theory."

LORD BROUGHAM.—"There is but one question I would ask the author, Is the Spiritualism of this work foreign to our materialistic, manufacturing age? No; for amidst the varieties of mind which divers circumstances produce are found those who cultivate man's highest faculties; to these the author addresses himself. But even in the most cloudless skies of scepticism I see a rain-cloud, if it be no bigger than a man's hand; it is modern Spiritualism."—Preface by Lord Brougham to "The Book of Nature." By C. O. Groom Napier, F.C.S.

THE LONDON DIALECTICAL COMMITTEE reported: "1. That sounds of a very varied character, apparently proceeding from articles of furniture, the floor and walls of the room—the vibrations accompanying which sounds are often distinctly perceptible to the touch—occur, without being produced by muscular action or mechanical contrivance. 2. That movements of heavy bodies take place without muscular force by those present of any kind, or adequate exertion of muscular force by those present, and frequently without contact or connection with any person. 3. That these sounds and movements often occur at the time and in the manner asked for by persons present, and, by means of a simple code of signals, answer questions and spell out coherent communications."

PROFESSOR BARRETT, F.R.S.E.—"I know and rejoice in the blessing Spiritualism has been to my own faith, and to that of several dear friends of mine. Moreover, I cordially recognise the fact that in bereavement and deep distress numbers have been cheered and consoled by the hope that Spiritualism has set before them. . . . So far from Materialism being true, I do not believe a single person has ever yet lived on this earth who has truly and heartily desired to know if an intelligent and personal existence be possible without our present bodily organism, and has steadily set himself to solve this supreme question with all the help he can gain from every source,—I say I do not believe any such earnest seeker after truth has ever failed to obtain a clear and definite answer in the affirmative."

CAMILLE FLAMMARION, THE FRENCH ASTRONOMER, AND MEMBER OF THE ACADEMIE FRANCAISE.—"I do not hesitate to affirm my conviction, based on personal examination of the subject, that any scientific man who declares the phenomena denominated 'magnetic,' 'somnambulic,' 'mediumic,' and others not yet explained by science to be 'impossible,' is one who speaks without knowing what he is talking about; and also any man accustomed, by his professional avocations, to scientific observation—provided that his mind be not biased by pre-conceived opinions, nor his mental vision blinded by that opposite kind of illusion, unhappily too common in the learned world, which consists in imagining that the laws of Nature are already known to us, and that everything which appears to overstep the limit of our present formulas is impossible—may acquire a radical and absolute certainty of the reality of the facts alluded to."

CHOWELL F. VAILEY, F.R.S.—"Twenty-five years ago I was a hard-headed unbeliever. . . . Spiritual phenomena, however, suddenly and quite unexpectedly, were soon after developed in my own family. . . . This led me to inquire and to try numerous experiments in such a way as to preclude, as much as circumstances would permit, the possibility of trickery and self-deception. . . . He then details various phases of the phenomena which had come within the range of his personal experience, and continues: "Other and numerous phenomena have occurred, proving the existence (a) of forces unknown to science; (b) the power of instantly reading my thoughts; (c) the presence of some intelligence or intelligences controlling those powers. . . . That the phenomena occur there is overwhelming evidence, and it is too late now to deny their existence."

ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, F.R.S.—"My position, therefore, is that the phenomena of Spiritualism in their entirety do not require further confirmation. They are proved, quite as well as any facts are proved in other sciences, and it is not denial or quibbling that can disprove any of them, but only fresh facts and accurate deductions from those facts. When the opponents of Spiritualism can give a record of their researches approaching in duration and completeness to those of its advocates; and when they can discover and show in detail, either how the phenomena are produced or how the many sane and able men here referred to have been deluded into a coincident belief that they have witnessed them; and when they can prove the correctness of their theory by producing a like belief in a body of equally sane and able unbelievers—then, and not till then, will it be necessary for Spiritualists to produce fresh confirmation of facts which are, and always have been, sufficiently real and indisputable to satisfy any honest and persevering inquirer."—Miracles and Modern Spiritualism.

DR. LOCKHART ROBERTSON.—"The writer" (i.e., Dr. L. Robertson) "can now no more doubt the physical manifestations of so-called Spiritualism than he would any other fact, as, for example, the fall of the apple to the ground, of which his senses informed him. As stated above, there was no place or chance of any legerdemain, or fraud, in these physical manifestations. He is aware, even from recent experience, of the impossibility of convincing anyone, by a mere narrative of events apparently so out of harmony with all our knowledge of the laws which govern the physical world, and he places these facts on record rather as an act of justice due to those whose similar statements he had elsewhere doubted and denied, than with either the desire or hope of convincing others. Yet he cannot doubt the ultimate recognition of facts of the truth of which he is so thoroughly convinced. Admit these physical manifestations, and a strange and wide world of research is opened to our inquiry. This field is new to the materialist mind of the last two centuries, which even in the writings of divines of the English Church, doubts and denies all spiritual manifestations and agencies, be they good or evil."—From a letter by Dr. Lockhart Robertson, published in the Dialectical Society's Report on Spiritualism, p. 24.

NASSAU WILLIAM SENIOR.—"No one can doubt that phenomena like these (Phrenology, Homeopathy, and Mesmerism) deserve to be observed, recorded, and arranged; and whether we call by the name of mesmerism, or by any other name, the science which proposes to do this, is a mere question of nomenclature. Among those who profess this is a mere question of nomenclature. Among those who profess this science there may be careless observers, prejudiced recorders and rash systematisers; their errors and defects may impede the progress of knowledge, but they will not stop it. And we have no doubt that, before the end of this century, the wonders which perplex almost equally those who accept and those who reject modern mesmerism will be distributed into defined classes, and found subject to ascertained laws—in other words, will become the subjects of a science." These views will prepare us for the following statement, made in the Spiritual Magazine, 1864, p. 336: "We have only to add, as a further tribute to the attainments and honours of Mr. Senior, that he was by long inquiry and experience a firm believer in spiritual power and manifestations. Mr. Home was his frequent guest, and Mr. Senior made no secret of his belief among his friends. He it was who recommended the publication of Mr. Home's recent work by Messrs. Longmans, and he authorised the publication, under initials, of one of the striking incidents there given, which happened to a near and dear member of his family."

WHAT CONJURERS SAY ABOUT PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

Mediums, who are the instruments of an external agency, have, more than once, been confronted with conjurers who deceive by sleight of hand; and in the same manner that no man of science who has thoroughly and fairly investigated the phenomena has failed to become convinced of their reality, so no conjurer who has been confronted with the same facts has been able to explain their occurrence by prestidigitation. Houdin, Jacobus, Bellachini, Hermann, Kellar, and others have already confessed their powerlessness to produce under the same conditions what occurs without human intervention in the presence of a medium.

Testimony of Robert Houdin.

The Marquis Endes de Mirville published during the lifetime of Houdin two letters from the latter, in his "Mémoire adressé à MM. les membres de l'Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques, sur un grand nombre de phénomènes merveilleux intéressant également la Religion, la Science, et les hommes du Monde," in which the conjurer confesses his inability to explain the phenomena he witnessed in the presence of Alexis, the clairvoyant. A circumstantial account is given of M. de Mirville's visit to Houdin for the purpose of engaging him in this investigation, of the latter's confidence in his own ability to detect the trick, and of what took place at the séance, the conditions of which were entirely under Houdin's control. This account extends over twelve pages, and its accuracy is confirmed by Houdin in the first of the documents now translated:—

"Although very far from accepting the eulogies which M. — is good enough to bestow upon me, and especially insisting that I am not at all committed to opinions, either in favour of magnetism or against it, I can, nevertheless, not refrain from declaring that the facts above reported are entirely correct (sont de la plus complète exactitude), and that, the more I reflect upon them, the more impossible I find it to rank them among those which belong to my art and profession.

14th May, 1847.

ROBERT HOUDIN."

A fortnight later, M. de Mirville received another letter, in which the following, referring to another séance, occurs:—

"I have, therefore, returned from this séance as astonished as it is possible to be, and persuaded that it is utterly impossible that chance or skill could ever produce effects so wonderful (tout à fait impossible que le hasard ou l'adresse puisse jamais produire des effets aussi merveilleux).—I am, monsieur, &c.,

May 16th, 1847.

(Signed), ROBERT HOUDIN."

Testimony of Harry Kellar.

Harry Kellar, a distinguished professor of legerdemain, investigated the slate-writing phenomena which occurred in the presence of Mr. Eglinton, at Calcutta, in January, 1882, and on the 25th of that month he addressed a letter to the editor of the Indian Daily News, in which he said:—

"In your issue of the 13th January I stated that I should be glad of an opportunity of participating in a séance with a view of giving an unbiased opinion as to whether, in my capacity of a professional prestidigitator, I could give a natural explanation of effects said to be produced by spiritual aid.

"I am indebted to the courtesy of Mr. Eglinton, the Spiritualistic medium now in Calcutta, and of his host, Mr. J. Mengens, for affording me the opportunity I craved.

"It is needless to say I went as a sceptic, but I must own that I have come away utterly unable to explain, by any natural means, the phenomena that I witnessed on Tuesday evening. I will give a brief description of what took place."

After describing several successful experiments, Mr. Kellar proceeds:—

"In respect to the above manifestations, I can only say that I do not expect my account of them to gain general credence. Forty-eight hours before I should not have believed anyone who described such manifestations under similar circumstances. I still remain a sceptic as regards Spiritualism, but I repeat my inability to explain or account for what must have been an intelligent force that produced the writing on the slate, which, if my senses are to be relied on, was in no way the result of trickery or sleight of hand."

On the 30th of the same month Mr. Kellar addressed another letter to the Indian Daily News, reporting some experiences of another kind with Mr. Eglinton, and regarding which he said:—

"In conclusion, let me state that after a most stringent trial and strict scrutiny of these wonderful experiences I can arrive at no other conclusion than that there was no trace of trickery in any form; nor was there in the room any mechanism or machinery by which could be produced the phenomena which had taken place. The ordinary mode by which Maskelyne and other conjurers imitate levitation or the floating test could not possibly be done in the room in which we were assembled."

The Testimony of Professor Jacobs.

Professor Jacobs, writing to the editor of Licht, mehr Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—

"Spite of the assertions, more or less trustworthy, of the French and English journalists, and spite of the foolish jealousies of ignorant conjurers, I feel it my duty to show up the bad faith of one party and the chicanery of the other. All that has been said or done adverse to these American mediums is absolutely trustworthy. If we would rightly judge of a thing we must understand it, and neither the journalists nor the conjurers possessed the most elementary knowledge of the science that governs these phenomena. As a prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the mediumistic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect.

"Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. If (as I have every reason to hope) the psychical studies, to which I am applying myself at this time, succeed, I shall be able to establish clearly, and that by public demonstration, the immense line of demarcation which separates mediumistic phenomena from conjuring proper, and then equivocation will be no longer possible, and persons will have to yield to evidence, or deny through predetermination to deny."

"Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also the individuality of the spirit in 'spiritual manifestation.' I authorise you, dear sir, to insert this letter in your next number, if agreeable to you," &c., &c.

Testimony of Samuel Bellachini.

Samuel Bellachini, Court Conjurer at Berlin, made the following declaration in December, 1877:—

"I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Berne; Butler, in St. Petersburg, to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the 'How' of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a notary and witnesses.

"Berlin, December 6th, 1877. (Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI."

ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By "M.A. (Oxon.)."

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct séances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experiences in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two, of negative, passive temperament, and preferably of the female sex, the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each sitter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Scepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitter spirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear. Patience is essential, and it may be necessary to meet ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such a trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful séance.

The first indications of success usually are a cold breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twitchings of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not aiding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over, but not in contact with, it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if the attempt to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might disconcert an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will check noisy manifestations.

Lastly, try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your reason. Do not enter into a very solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well-grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.

A PROBLEM FOR CONJURERS.

By CARL DU PREL (Munich.)

(Translated by V.)

"Quam multa fieri non posse, priusquam facta sint, iudicantur."

I.—THE FACTS.

I have described this séance so much in detail because by it the opinion I had previously formed was confirmed, that is, that the mental attitude plays a great part in these matters, and that, given equally favourable conditions, every circle will obtain as much as it deserves. I am convinced that tiresome restrictions of a sceptical character and conditions imposed by ourselves only hinder the results; while with our moral support the most astonishing phenomena take place, without the demonstrative power or proof being in the least weakened. Anyone who examines these facts, free from prejudice and willing to be convinced, will be convinced, and this is confirmed, in my mind, by my experience in other sittings. The lesson is drawn from the accounts of mysticism in all ages that belief and confidence are very important agents. Anyone, on the contrary, who suspects imposture in everything and comes to the table convinced a priori that it is all humbug, can scarcely expect to be converted. This and not any other explanation, is the cause that mysticism has disappeared simultaneously with belief; but I do not mean hereby to say that this favourable moral disposition is injured by scientific precautions. From a sceptical standpoint it would be thought that the more ignorant, credulous, and devoid of precaution the members of a circle, the more astounding would be the phenomena produced through the medium; the case is, however, directly the opposite; among the most cautious of experimenters, such as Crookes and Zollner, scientists may certainly be reckoned, and some of the most wonderful phenomena that have ever been witnessed have been produced in their presence. What I mean to say, therefore, is simply this, that the experiments instituted by these inquirers, in spite of the most stringent and scientific tests, were forwarded by their mental disposition of really wishing to arrive at the truth, but were not the confirmation of a foregone conclusion.

After the séance, Eglinton told us that he had only once before obtained similar results inside a closed book, and that then only a few words were written.

The assertion that only silly and trivial writings take place, is entirely unjustified by my experience. On the contrary, the answers are often better than would be expected from average human beings. On the other side, I have found no traces of superhuman intelligence. Whatsoever the power producing them may be, it certainly is strongly akin to that of human beings, and this is strikingly shown in the mistakes which here and there occur. By way of variety, I once drew a man's face on a slate, at a distance from the medium, who likewise by way of a change, pushed the slate under Baron Hellenbach, who was sitting next him, so that the latter sat upon it. Immediately afterwards we got a copy of the face. But when afterwards I, likewise privately, drew on a slate a pentagram and then a somewhat similar theosophical sign—two triangles crossing one another—and asked to have a copy, only the last sign was drawn, but this twice over. Therefore on the part of the acting intelligence it may be supposed that some sort of mistake is possible of an optical nature. The following instance of a similar character is very instructive. A gentleman of the circle left the table and placed a bank-note inside the slate, which he then brought back, demanding that the value and number of the note should be written. The answer was given: "One florin, 806149." Instead of "8" it should have been "3." When, however, we came to examine the note, which was no longer new and smooth, it seemed as though we might easily have made the same mistake ourselves on a cursory examination. Therefore no abstract power can have been in question, such as clairvoyance, but one in some way connected with the senses, and subject to error. Sceptics would say that the medium had seen it, but I ask how, under such conditions, could the medium write, and, as I said before, it is from conjurers themselves that I demand an answer.

The only hypothesis which now remains for the sceptic is that in all the different séances, in different houses, and with all the different persons with whom I have sat, I have been duped, inasmuch as on every occasion the whole circle were in league with the medium. I might disprove this supposition by giving the names of my companions; but I should be scarcely justified in doing this, on account of the unscrupulous peculiarities of our journalists. I may indeed mention the name of Baron Hellenbach, because I know from himself that he belongs, like myself, to the category of persons whose skins are thick enough to be indifferent to attacks from journalists.

Some sceptics assert that there are tricks performed by conjurers which are quite as inexplicable as the mediumistic phenomena. This is true to a certain extent, but though there may be some identity in the marvels themselves, there is none in the process by which they are produced. In another respect, however, this assertion is quite unfounded; since conjurers' tricks may be performed by anyone with sufficient practice; while the performances with mediums depend on particular organisations, the peculiarities of which are still very little known. The tricks of conjurers are mechanical, and depend either on the apparatus employed or on sleight of hand; mediumistic phenomena are on the contrary, dependent on organic causes; and when these are analysed, it is evident that a sharp line of demarcation exists between them and conjuring tricks. This line of demarcation will be set forth in the following pages.

Some sceptics throw suspicion on the performances with mediums because some of them can be imitated. When they find out a case of this sort, they triumph, overlooking the many things which remain unexplained, and draw the unjustifiable conclusion that every phenomenon can be imitated under similar conditions. There is no sense in this notion, for everything may be imitated, even the appearance of apparitions, as every theatrical machinist is aware. But it does not follow that everything must be performed in this manner, otherwise the existence of forged bank-notes would prove that there are no genuine ones.

A person who examines the facts in an objective manner will proceed, therefore, quite differently, and will by so doing find out the sharp line which separates conjuring tricks and medial phenomena. For instance, among the latter there are cases in which, in spite of their inexplicability, a mechanical origin is just possible, and others when this is logically not to be imagined and therefore is impossible—phenomena which cannot be brought about by any of the laws known to us, and which, therefore, come under the domain of laws of nature as yet unknown to us. The objective inquirer, distinguishing clearly between what is simply inexplicable and what is inconceivable, will seek for such kinds of medial phenomena which cannot, at least under the same conditions, be imitated, and in the case of which a mechanical origin is, therefore, not to be conceived. In this way, then, the existence of a transcendental cause must be considered proved, even if all other phenomena were really only imposture. The fact of the phenomena being inexplicable is therefore of no use, this being neither for nor against the question, and has the less to do with the real cause, because this marvel of the inexplicability of the occurrences is only a subjective one on the part of the inquirer, and varies even according to his degree of acuteness. Therefore an objective marvel must be sought in the performance itself, and one, too, which does not change and which cannot be regarded in a different way, but the performance of which is contrary to what is to be done by mechanical laws, and is therefore inconceivable (undenkbar). What we cannot explain is at the same time within the bounds of possibility; what is not to be conceived is impossible, and equally so to all inquirers. If the phenomenon, therefore, happens in spite of everything, the proof of a transcendental cause is made manifest.

The application of this principle to slate-writing is evident. If we suppose Eglinton to be a conjurer, the question must be asked how the deception is performed and when. If we limit our inquiries as to the how we come indeed upon what is inexplicable, but not what is impossible. For instance, that Spiritualistic slate-writing can be imitated I know myself, and indeed indirectly even from the originators of this performance. I am, therefore, the more capable of deciding that the phenomena with Slade and Eglinton are genuine, since each of these can produce an imitation. But we arrive at what is inconceivable, and therefore impossible, and thereby recognise the necessity of a transcendental cause, when we examine into the when of the supposed deception. It is quite clear that this imposture can only be performed after the question has been put; for to give a sensible and exhaustive answer to a question, the latter must be known, even supposing it a case of thought-transference. It is further clear that since the medium does not know the question, the supposition of a mechanical arrangement, which in this case could only be that of prepared slates, is excluded, and the only imaginable one left is that of the performance being executed by sleight of hand, after the question has been put. Now the few minutes which elapse between the putting of the question and the unlocking of the folding slate are spent by the medium in a state of passivity. His hands lie motionless upon the slates; it is, therefore, an impossibility to think that immovable hands are performing at the same time feats of dexterity. A few minutes only, therefore, are available for the deception, outside of which it is in the first place simply impossible, therefore it is logically not to be conceived, and consequently utterly impossible. A transcendental cause, therefore, exists, in which the medium only assists organically and passively, since the power is derived from his organism, which is employed for the mechanical purpose of executing the slate-writings.

PHASES OF MATERIALIZATION.

IN THE

OBJECTIVE PHENOMENA OF SPIRITUALISM.

Lastly, I adduce from a record in "LIGHT" * some facts recorded by Mr. Morell Theobald. He had had Miss Wood, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, staying with him in his own house. Under those best of all possible conditions he witnessed what I transcribe in somewhat abridged form from his account. The séance was held in a room specially fitted up for the purpose, and under conditions which were good and satisfactory.

"'Pocha' (the little familiar of the medium), as usual, talked for about an hour, which I wished over, although she assured us she was not wasting time, but the spirits were busy in the cabinet materialising—as, indeed, they were. The medium was, after this, taken into the cabinet, and we sat in light sufficient to see one another and the cabinet clearly. We heard some alteration going on as to who was to come out, which was decided in favour first of 'Pocha.' Beside Miss Wood now entranced, was also one of our own number, the one nearest to the cabinet, but three or four feet distant. Out came little 'Pocha,' a vivacious little sprite about three feet high, known to a good many. She brought out of the cabinet with her the fairy bells—an instrument two feet in length and seven or eight inches wide, weighing 2½ lbs. This she placed on the chair where Miss Wood had been sitting, and we distinctly saw her little dark hands fingering the strings as a child would to amuse itself. She then went up to my wife, who was sitting four or five feet from the cabinet, took her hand, and as my wife leaned downwards she put her tiny arms round her neck and kissed her. She then crossed over the room and took my hand, then my daughter's, and my daughter-in-law's hands, fondled them a bit, and retired to the cabinet. Again the curtains opened, and out came a tall female form with less power than 'Pocha,' nor was she able to speak as 'Pocha' had done. But she was known to our clairvoyants, who saw her through the white drapery in which she was enveloped: and it was interesting to us as the promised form of our departed daughter who for years had promised to come out among us. Gaining power, she slowly walked up towards her mother and gave her her hand, but had not sufficient power to embrace her as she evidently tried to do. She then walked to the chair on which the fairy bells were resting, took them up and walked to me with them, leaving them in my hands. I took her hand gently, but it, although fully materialised, lacked the firm touch of little 'Pocha's,' and seemed too ethereal to be pressed. We were all delighted, however, thus to see her for the first time, but not prepared for all that was to follow. On her retiring, another spirit came out, who looked towards his father, but lacked the power to reach him at the furthest part of the room. He was known to our clairvoyants, and indicated his identity by bowing his head as his name was given.

"Those who have read 'Heaven Opened; or, Messages from our Little Ones in Spirit-land,' by F. J. Theobald, will know that some years ago we lost three little ones, one after another; lost to sight only, for we have had repeated indications of their nearness. And now the three sweet little spirits, one after another, came out, materialised for the first time. How can I describe the delicate little forms of infants radiant in light? It was indeed a Sabbath evening of holy communion, and to us the place was holy as these forms of light walked among us. But I fancy I hear some one, more critical than sympathetic, saying: Yes, but where was Miss Wood? I reply: Hitherto she was in the cabinet, sometimes talking while the spirits were moving about, and at other times breathing so as to be heard by those nearest the cabinet, to three clairvoyants present seen distinctly with the spirit forms. But we are not all clairvoyants! No; so for those the following phase occurred.

"Miss Wood was now brought out of the cabinet; still entranced, and seated in view of all, in front, outside: all saw her, while the curtains, now slightly opened, disclosed the spirit light. Some papers had been pinned upon the curtains, for more readily noting their movements. A hand now, seen by some only, took out the pins and threw the papers on to the floor, this latter was seen by all. Now as the curtain was opened all saw the light and those on one side the form of a spirit, very tall. 'Pocha' said, 'There's another spirit coming out with a baby,' and there it was. But a storm broke over us and broke also the conditions." [1883.]

This is a convenient place to append an account of a very instructive experience which throws light on the methods employed in materialization, and is suitably introduced when I am dealing with the simultaneous appearance of the medium and the form. The narrative sufficiently explains itself. It is extracted from my "Notes by the Way." The following experience of the double of the medium is one that was familiar to me ten years ago. I have seen myself, and others have related to me the same experience,—"John King's" well known face, minus his beard, floating over Mr. Williams' head. It was palpably his double. I have seen under the drapery that covered the hand and arm that carried the well-known "spirit-lamp,"—the self-luminous cake, as it appeared—the duplication of the black coat-sleeve and white cuff of the medium; and that, when there was no question of his being securely held, and accounted for.

The first letter which I quote is from Mr. J. G. Keulemans, 34, Matilda-street, Barnsbury, and bears date July 13th. He is writing respecting the duplication of the body of the medium, and he gives these cases:—

"1. Our medium, Mr. Husk, was seated at the table, hands being linked as usual. Towards the close of the séance—after our familiar 'John King' had left the circle*—a tremendously powerful light, illuminating the entire room, suddenly appeared over our heads, every one present being visible. I saw the double of the medium standing erect and holding this spirit light in his outstretched right hand. Yet, at the same moment, I saw the medium seated in his usual place! There was no one present whom I could possibly have mistaken for the figure representing the medium. It was Mr. Husk without any doubt, and the person sitting behind this figure was also undoubtedly, Mr. Husk.

"The light moved forward, and, although rapidly diminishing in power, was even then so intense as to distinctly reflect a phosphorescent glow on the partly uncovered fore-arm of the form holding it. But by this time the form was draped, and it spoke in the familiar voice of 'Irresistible' (the sailor-spirit)! Of the medium or his double nothing could now be discovered.

"2. On last Sunday, July 6th, a somewhat similar manifestation took place. As on the previous occasion, 'John King' had left, leaving, this time, the power to a familiar spirit known as 'Ebenezer.'

"The latter showed himself as a bust, moving in front of the medium. A strange irregularity in the arrangement of the drapery disclosed an interspace of black material between the hand and shoulder.

"As the black material had all the appearance of a coat-sleeve I requested 'Ebenezer' to exhibit his arm. This he did by stretching it out full length, showing the unmistakable coat-sleeve and a separate piece of coarser drapery concealing the hand. Not being altogether satisfied, I again requested to have also this loose piece of drapery shown to me, my object being, not to pay much attention to this particular part, but to try and discover the whereabouts of the medium. I was certain he would be firmly held by his nearest sitters, one of whom happened to be a lady friend of mine, far from being convinced as yet.

"When the arm, covered with the loose piece of drapery, was approaching me, and the luminous slate showed the coat-sleeve also, I managed to peep underneath it, and I saw the medium in his usual place at the table.

"I must remark here that the luminous slate, used by the forms to exhibit themselves, was exceedingly powerful that evening, on account of having, during these present long days, been exposed to the light from early morning. Also, that on the previous occasion when the double was seen, an extraordinarily powerful light was present.

"3. I find in Dr. Nichols' 'Biography of the Davenports' that a hand was seen in the cabinet, partly covered by a coat-sleeve and a wristband—just as those worn by the mediums.

"4. On another occasion, i.e., with Eglinton as medium,

* Several full forms had been maintained—including "John King," whom that evening I measured and found to exceed the medium's height by 6in.

I noticed a similar "strange incident." A full form appeared, which was described (by 'Joey') as being a negro king. The face was perfectly black, though the hands were white, and the left one, being plainly visible to several persons, was partly covered by a white cuff, the links being also discernible, and both cuff and links were like those worn by the medium before and after the séance. Unfortunately the medium had retired into an adjacent room, and the whereabouts of his real person could not be accounted for. Yet I am prepared to believe now (I was not then) that, notwithstanding the discrepancy, the medium was then actually wearing the identical cuffs and links of which we saw the counterpart on the form. I have no doubt that these different manifestations I have quoted, i.e., of the double, belong to the same category, and have also reasons to surmise that the so-called transformation belongs to it also. It may be true that a strong light will prevent the materializations altogether; yet it may be possible for some more 'advanced' spirits to obtain and exhibit the modus operandi of these form-productions in a subdued light—I mean a tolerably good light—not the mere glimmer (often called 'full light'), which merely shows the darkness of the surroundings."

MR. SINNETT'S novel, "Karma," is now being issued in one volume.

Fair Play is the name of a new semi-monthly devoted to Spiritualism that has just made its appearance in Elmira, New York.

M. RICHER, the distinguished French séant, is now in England, and is investigating the phenomena of Spiritualism.

THE Spiritual Messenger is the title of another new paper devoted to Spiritualism in America. It is published at Minneapolis.

WE hear that Mrs. Richmond's address "On the New Political State" has given great satisfaction and pleasure to many of her friends.

MR. C. D. LAKEY, editor and proprietor of The American Builder and Woodworker, Insurance, and other papers, who has been spending the summer in England, returned to the United States last week. Mr. Lakey is an old Spiritualist, and an experienced and critical investigator.

MRS. MELLON, a Newcastle medium, well-known in Spiritualistic circles some years ago when Miss Fairbank, is now making a tour through the provinces, and is expected in London in a week or two. It is said that Mrs. Mellon is an excellent medium for materialisation.

THE Theosophical Society of America has passed a resolution that the Society shall "assume and exercise supervision of the American Society for Psychical Research, and the Board of Control of the Theosophical Society does hereby assume and proceed to exercise such supervision. In pursuance whereof the Board of Control does hereby authorise and require one of their number, Professor Elliott Cones, Member of the National Academy of Sciences, &c., to act as Censor of the said American Society for Psychical Research, and to publicly review and criticise any and all of the proceedings, transactions, bulletins, or other printed matter which the said Society may publish, at his judgment and discretion." (1)

A PSYCHICAL OPPORTUNITY.—In the North American Review for September, Miss Elizabeth Stuart Phelps has a suggestive article on the marvels of Modern Spiritualism, and the reluctance of scientific men to attempt a fair and genuine investigation of the whole subject. And whether Spiritualism be true or false, or a mixture of truth and falsehood, it is an undoubted fact, Miss Phelps declares, that "thousands of sensible and reliable men and women believe these things on the strength of personal experience; and, believing, accept them with such explanation of their own as they may, in default of any from silent science. It would seem as if these circumstances were of as much importance to science as the transverse lamellæ in the beak of a shoveler duck, or the climate of the lowlands under the equator during the severe part of the glacial period."

THE FRENCH PRESS AND SPIRITISM.—The age of steam, electricity, the telephone, &c., cannot pass before the general recognition of spirit. A short time ago Spiritism was the subject of railery, and writers for the Press were merry about holding communication with the spirits of the departed, although the fact of such communication is as old as humanity; witness the traditions of all peoples. To-day Spiritism is more cordially acknowledged than it has hitherto been. In the high Press it is now a subject for grave articles, and even scientific discussion of it is asked for. It is being gradually withdrawn from the comments of writers who only know how to abuse it, to become the subject of serious discussion and explanation.—Le Lumière.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[It is preferable that correspondents should append their names and addresses to communications. In any case, however, these must be supplied to the Editor as a guarantee of good faith.]

"Facts and Theories."
To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—My friendly and able opponent, "Thymol," credits me with an "erudition" to which I can make no pretence, and with an "experience," which, in things psychical, is probably not wider than that of many of your readers, and is certainly less wide than that of some of them.

I hope to reduce the difference between "Thymol" and myself by a possibly clearer expression of my own meaning. My position is that no fact ever has influenced, or ever can influence, mankind, or be in any true sense believed, unless and until it is brought under some conception which may be the hypothesis of a scientific mind, or may be a general idea of nature at the particular stage of human culture. A mere fact, unilluminated by thought, is not an object at all for mind. I need not go into the elementary metaphysics of "the form of intelligence prior to its content," but taking "Thymol's" own true, though too limited, statement, of that, I maintain that the law of cognition it represents is not confined to the elementary consciousness, but is applicable to its reflective movements, to its whole progressive development. The Kantian reversal of Locke was not merely an improved theory of sense perception: it revolutionised the whole philosophy of human knowledge. The formal intelligence against the "blank sheet of paper" all along the line! We need the light of reason to see our facts, as we need the light of the sun or moon to see the block of stone upon our path. We may kick our shins against the stone in the gloom, and will then probably swear at it, as the materialistic mind resents the mental obstruction of a "psychical phenomenon," which is forthwith forgotten or denied. "He could not do many wondrous works there, because of their unbelief." There was no mental preparation, no "form of intelligence." What a psychologist was He! He knew that the conditions of effective belief were not simply psychical presence and a material occurrence, that true belief is a pre-formation of the mind, and the outward occurrence merely the occasion of consciousness.

But it should be remembered that I expressly excluded the case of personal experience of these phenomena, and was only considering the conditions on which testimony to them can be fairly weighed. I say that the estimation of testimony in matters not conformable to our own experience is subjective, and that this is proved by the formula so often advanced, that evidence must be proportional to probability. If we analyse the conception of probability (other, of course, than mathematical chances) we find that it is intelligibility. If I can construct in imagination a set of conditions and antecedents of a phenomenon, it becomes intelligible, and ceases to be "improbable" in so far as these supposed conditions and antecedents can themselves be connected with the scheme of my experience. I see now, one says, how it could naturally happen. Objectively, the evidence that it really did happen is no better than it was before, but our relation to the evidence at once becomes different. For instance: one says to me, "It rained at such a place when and where I was." If for any reason the fact has an interest for me, I have at once a positive belief in it upon this testimony, supposing that not to be impaired by any other circumstance. But, now, let one say to me, "It rained when and where I was from an absolutely cloudless sky." I should disbelieve this concrete fact (rain and cloudless sky) because it would not accord with any conception in my mind of natural processes. It would be a phenomenon isolated from any physical context I could conceive. But let me read in the newspaper next morning of a scientific discovery that moisture can be discharged by some electrical process in the atmosphere without any vaporous condensation, and my relation to yesterday's testimony is immediately altered. I see now, that, and how, the phenomenon could have been, and I give back to the evidence its objective value of which my subjective ignorance had deprived it. All the world would have said I judged logically in the first instance. Hume said that the King of Siam was right to disbelieve the Dutch ambassador's account of ice. It comes then to this: that testimony, though constantly being verified in favour of our subjective "improbabilities," has no objective value, but its value is entirely relative to our subjective states! As against this principle of judgment, embodied in the famous and prevalent proposition about the relation between evidence and probability, I have for years done my feeble uttermost to assert the counter-principle that evidence alone has a constant objective value, that adverse presumptions are only legitimate in the absence of evidence, and because of its absence, and can never logically affect the estimate of evidence. But I am not therefore precluded from recognising a law of progressive knowledge which sets this logical position at defiance, nor from seeing a principle in that law which secures the worth and dignity of our knowledge as we get it. Facts are called stubborn things, but far more stubborn is the refusal of thought to "follow" facts, of the organic reason in us to be loaded with an indigestible matter. Momentary assent, it is true, may be forced upon us by a "personal and palpable" experience, but that is not intelligent belief. And the question here is as to belief on foreign testimony. I must again refer to what I think is one of the best things in literature in this relation, Mr. Lecky's exposition of the causes of the great modern transition from the unquestioning belief in the intervention of spiritual agencies to that absolute disbelief in it and in them which characterises modern Rationalism. Those causes were purely and entirely intellectual. The positive evidence was never directly met or answered; it simply came to be disregarded, because the mental categories had ceased to be adapted to the facts. If the latter have a better prospect now, it is not because the evidence is more compulsory, but because the mode of thought of the materialistic phase has nearly run its course; having attained its full development it is being pushed off the spiritual stem by a new tendency of thought, a new out-growth of the immanent reason of the Western nations of the race. One symptom of this is the recent revival of philosophy, of metaphysical studies, almost as much disliked and contemned by the "Aufklärung" as even phenomenal evidences of supersensuous existence. The law of progress is evolution, not accretion. It is nature within us that adapts us to herself, for her external counterpart is just our representation of inward, spiritual truth. The same philosophy which teaches us that phenomena are not "things in themselves," must be carried into the higher field of intelligence which concerns the material for our theories and judgments. As phenomenon, indeed, this material belongs already to the lower field of perception by the formal sense; for sense it is a "fact," but not for reason till the latter can take it up into its own forms, can deal with it in its own modes, and make it a fact for intelligence. You will easily get from reason the abstract admission that there are facts of sense which are not facts of intelligence, but never the recognition of this or that fact of sense till reason is prepared in some way to deal with it, that is, until the fact has already a possible significance. And this significance is not the significance of a perfectly objective logic, not what the fact can or does prove for a fully developed faculty of rational apprehension, but is its actual relation to the mind at a given stage of thought. Now the mere apprehension of a fact as belonging to the world of sense cannot establish that higher relation to intelligence which the latter demands, and must demand, as the condition of notice. The greatest living man of science in England said calmly of the Spiritualistic facts, "If true, they do not interest me," a sentence which, though I have but just remembered it, and it certainly suggested nothing that I had written up to the moment I remembered it, really illustrates, with the force of a proof, my whole position.

I am sorry that "Thymol" thinks me so "innocent" as to wish to bait our facts with bad theories. He forgets that his opinion of the theories in question is not necessarily mine, and that I may, as the fact is, think them good, though inadequate, theories, and very defensible leading strings to intelligence. I see an enormous and ever-growing pile of evidence; aye, of first-rate and unanswerable evidence, which has apparently a very partial affinity with the intelligence of mankind. Consequently it is ignored when it is not denied. I once thought—and this, I believe, was the principle of the Psychical Society itself—that by analysing, sifting, accumulating, and republishing the evidence, the human mind could be influenced from without, and that those secondary forms of thought which constitute the intellectual tendency of an age could be modified or changed by mere external, material pressure—the pressure of "facts." I did not see that this was a disguised materialism of

IMPORTANT ANNOUNCEMENTS.

The reprint of Mr. Massey's translation of Dr. E. von Hartmann's brochure on "Spiritism" will be ready shortly. As the edition is a limited one, those who desire to possess this book should order it at once. The price will be three shillings, and orders may be sent to the Psychological Press, 16, Craven-street, Strand, London.

We have received the report of the circle who sat en séance in the alleged haunted house at W—. This account of the extraordinary phenomena which took place will be published in next week's "LIGHT."

We have been requested by the Psychological Press, 16, Craven-street, Strand, to announce that they have at last received a supply of "Biogen," by Professor Eliot Cones, and that copies may now be obtained. If those who ordered this book early in the year still desire it, will they make the requisite application in the proper quarter?

In answer to inquiries with reference to "Twist Two Worlds," we are requested to state that it will appear shortly. M. Tissot has completed his portrait etching, having very happily caught what we may term "a psychical expression," and produced in other respects a valuable work of art. Mr. Keulemans is also well forward with his special department. We have seen the first proofs of his new chromo-lithographic drawings, and we are pleased to say that he has been very successful in his delineation of some of the stages of "materialisation." The chief difficulty has been, we understand, the almost insuperable task of crowding into a single volume matter enough to form a dozen; and the careful condensation necessary in a case of this kind has somewhat retarded the completion of the author's task. We are asked to assure subscribers that no time is being lost, and to request them to be good enough to believe that if further delay is experienced, it is unavoidably incident to the extreme care necessary with artistic work. In any case the volume will be issued before Christmas.

THE LONDON SPIRITUALIST ALLIANCE.—We wish to remind our readers that an advertisement of the next conversation appears in another column. This meeting will be held as usual in the Banqueting Hall, St. James's Hall, on the evening of Friday, November 13th, at 7 p.m. We hope there will be a good muster of members and friends as the President of the Alliance will then introduce a very important subject, bearing largely upon the progress of Spiritualism in this country.

THE THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY meets again at Queen Anne's Mansions for the commencement of its new session on Wednesday evening, October 28th. Cards of admission to this meeting, to which members may bring friends, can be obtained by application to the president, Mr. A. P. Sinnett, 7, Ladbroke-gardens. An address will be delivered on the 28th by Mr. Sinnett on "Some Recent Conclusions concerning Spiritual Evolution."

SOCIETY FOR PSYCHICAL RESEARCH.—A general meeting of this Society will be held on Thursday, October 29th, at the Garden Mansions, Queen Anne's Mansions, London, S.W. The President of the Society, Professor Balfour Stewart, F.R.S., will take the chair at 8.30 p.m. The meeting, which will be partly of a conversational character, is open to members and associates, who are at liberty to invite friends. Paper to be read: Frederic W. H. Myers, Esq., "Human Personality in the Light of Recent Hypnotic Experiments." Members and associates will be admitted on writing their names at the door. Persons who do not belong to the Society will be admitted on the production of an invitation card, duly filled in with one or more names, and signed by a member or associate.—EDWARD T. BENNETT, Secretary, 14, Dean's-yard, Westminster, S.W.

MRS. MALTRY, of 104, Sixth Avenue, Queen's Park, W., writes to us on behalf of Mrs. Sharington, who is again compelled to seek assistance, having been able to do but little work during the last sixteen months. She is suffering from consumption, and it is with great difficulty and pain that she is able to keep about a few hours during the day. She is alone and amongst strangers, and entirely without any means of support. She writes: "If any friends can assist to enable me to keep about as long as possible, so that I shall not be confined to bed long before the final separation, I shall be glad. I hope it will not be long. Death I do not fear, but I dread the suffering under the present conditions. I think it but just to speak of the kindness and patience of the healer who has attended me so long. I have not been able to give him good conditions through wanting the necessities of life. Therefore it is not his fault that I am still suffering. I beg to thank Mr. Burns for his great kindness in collecting money for me in the past, and those friends who have already assisted me." We shall be glad if any of our readers can assist in this case, which, as we understand, a thoroughly deserving one. Mrs. Sharington's address is, 24, Edward-street, Hampstead-road, N.W.

my own, the radically false conception I had imbibed from the inductive school, whose method can indeed bring to maturity sciences founded on established levels, but can never sink the foundations, or make use of facts belonging to a deeper order of experience. That is the office of the evolving spirit which reforms thought, creates philosophy, and relates man otherwise to nature, making him receptive to facts he had not seen before. New mental dispositions then open the way for new sciences, and a psychical science is possible only on that condition. The much contested psychology of Mr. Myers may not be a perfect adjustment to the facts, but it appeals to thought, and mediates the process of its evolution. For many minds it will redeem the facts from their mere brutality and make them objects of intelligence, the first condition of credibility.

I agree with "Thymol's" account of "the true man of science," and only regret that he is so very scarce! (Witness the refusal of the Royal Society to give even a hearing to Mr. Crookes' paper, and a whole history of similar "scientific" intolerance.) But when "Thymol" tells me of Darwin and other patient investigators, I reply that no man of science ever did or ever would undertake an investigation of facts which had not already an interest and significance for his mind. The theory for them is not developed a priori, but the form of intelligence from which, far more than from the facts, the theory arises, is there from the first, and if "Thymol" studies the history of scientific discovery, he will find even the germ of the theory, the undeveloped idea, has frequently been consciously present at a very early stage of the inquiry, and has actually directed the mind in its search for the facts.

"Thymol" agrees with the late Mr. Epes Sargent in finding fault with my definition of scientific evidence. It does not much signify to my argument, but I should like to ask him if he recognises a difference between knowledge and warrantable belief, and if so, at what point he considers the latter passes into the former and becomes "science"? Certainly, however, it is strange to me to hear that "Courts of Justice are easily satisfied." If "Thymol" had been prosecuting counsel in criminal cases as often as I have been he would not say so! I think I would accept any psychical phenomenon whatever on evidence equal to that which will induce an average English jury to find a well-defended prisoner guilty of stealing sixpence.

Why I should not consistently appeal to "plain experience" and "common experience" in support of my proposition that people don't believe what they cannot at all understand, I am unable to see. My whole argument is to show that this experience is theoretically intelligible, is not therefore a fact which I myself inconsistently accept without understanding it. And, indeed, as I have said, I could not believe the fact till the principle on which it is explicable dawned on my mind, and it is to me a striking confirmation of that principle, and the resulting law, that "Thymol" does not even now believe the fact, but still clings to the supposition that mind can take up phenomena without any pre-formation of intelligence than just such as belongs to sense-perception! Were he a convert to this philosophy, which is not mine, but results from the whole idealistic—that is spiritual—mode of thought, he would have no difficulty in recognising the fact which is staring him in the face in every social direction. In a word, men come to facts, not facts to men. Nature, which is Reason, projects the world of representation from within; it is imposed on no percipient by evidence from without.

"The Mother Clothed with the Sun."

SIR,—Can you find a corner for me in your excellent paper, just to express my deep appreciation of the admirable letter, in your issue of October 17th, signed "S. E. de M."?

I have not read the book, "The Mother," &c., that is therein reviewed, but the lesson to be learnt from that, and similar works, is so clearly and forcibly shown by "S. E. de M." that the letter cannot be too widely read; especially by my own sex, as the more emotional part of humanity. I have frequently thought I should like to see the last paragraph of "M. A. (Oxon.'s)" "Advice to Inquirers" with its good, sound, common-sense, heading in large letters every issue of your journal.

Very truly yours,

"Lily."

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 24TH, 1885.

AN APPEAL.

Our readers will have noticed that we have lately been extending the space heretofore given by us to records of psychical phenomena. This extension, we are glad to say, has been received with approval. The fact is, while we shall continue to consult the tastes of those of our readers, "for contemplation formed," we have a strong desire to put forth from week to week, and eventually to publish in book form, a body of evidence for each and every phase of the psychical manifestations.

Now "LIGHT" is fast becoming an organ of no mean circulation, and must be read by many more than actually buy it. We may very safely estimate that on the average each of our readers has had one psychical or spiritual experience, and knows a friend who has had one other. It is enough. We ought to be inundated with evidence.

This is far from being the case. We shall not stop to consider any reasons wherefore, which might be alleged, but which would seem derogatory, as lukewarmness, dislike of trouble, complacent enjoyment of privileges, and the like. We prefer to think well of everybody; and we really believe these have little influence over the minds of our readers. We put our finger, undoubtedly, on the sore spot, when we say that this deficiency of evidence is due to the dislike of private individuals to see their most intimate experiences blazed abroad to the public. But this is, if we may be allowed to say so, a sort of hysterical sore spot. It is the effect of a too sensitive imagination. The idea of publicity is to delicate persons like a horrible nightmare. They seem to see themselves revealed in fierce light to the gaze of the whole nation. The greedy British quidnunc will gobble up their story with his hurried breakfast, digest it in the train, and talk and laugh over it in every place of public resort. It will be such a catastrophe as almost to change their place in nature. The boys will run after them in the streets. Crowds will assemble round the house.

But with these delirious visions compare the facts. The story appears in our columns. It is read with only half an eye by many. But it brings, perhaps, conviction home to the breast of a few intelligent inquirers, and is observed very attentively by those who are quite worthy to observe it, and who are capable of drawing most useful conclusions from it. It is pointed out also by the writer's self to friends who have already heard it, and who are pleased to be able to read it. The world in general shows no signs of being acquainted with it. The busy hum goes on, neither broken by any pause of wonderment nor growing any louder. The horrid next door neighbour gives his usual civil "Don't want to know you" salutations, without apparently being informed of the extraordinary revelation which has been made. In short, it becomes just a little provoking. It is an agreeable disappointment.

But if such is the case when name and address are appended in full to the reported experience, the omission to send it when name and address are not obligatory, becomes, if our severity may be excused, palpably a dereliction of duty.

For, in brief, what is the too well-known condition of the present time? Philosophy has long been agnostic. Mysticism cannot raise its head. Religion is perishing. Only the giant form of Science is seen, darkening all faiths with its shadow.

"Whither is fled the visionary gleam?"

Where is it now, the glory and the dream?"

All is grey, grey with the greyness of the inner cerebrum. Ignorance is bliss. And the more knowledge a man has the more, too often, now, he seems disposed to seek refuge from thought in the excesses of a deplorable sensuality.

But from the very breast of Science is evolved a Hand to save us. Already in the pages of Bacon the forefinger was seen emerging. Throughout his work are scattered references to psychical facts, with constant declarations that the method of science should be applied to their investigation and proper understanding. These hints have been overlooked by narrower intellects addicted exclusively to physics. But now they are bearing fruit. We among the rest are touched by that Hand. And ought not we to have a better opportunity of knowing the facts than any others? But, alas! our readers who are in possession of the facts desert us. Would that they were all moved by the spirit of a correspondent, whose artless eloquence we so much prefer to anything we could say that we here insert an extract from a letter of his to us! It should have more effect by its example than any persuasion of ours could produce.

I thought, what is there left for me to do? Why have I been preserved so wonderfully? Why have I had to undergo so many trials and experienced so many sufferings in spirit? Now I think I see a glimmer of truth. Now I think I see the why and the wherefore. Now I know why I always desired to be a missionary and preacher, and was prevented.

You will acknowledge with me that three escapes from drowning in deep sea, five serious falls, dislocating my arm each time, one-half of the calf of my leg taken off, and an escape from falling down a precipice, while saving a companion in Switzerland, and yet to be well and hearty through all, is enough to make a thinking man ask, Why? and say, "Show me my work, I will do it." Every day the conviction gains strength upon me that that work is the spread of Spiritual teaching; spread of the knowledge of spirit communion; spread of the truth of the Fatherhood of God and brotherhood of man; "to teach men to study their Creator in all things, and in themselves in particular. To study Him and His creations—for there is nothing more." To rouse their manhood, that they shall look up to their Creator and know they must stand or fall on their own merits. That they are gods and goddesses in embryo. That man is the commencement, the end of the ray of light proceeding from the All-Light. That he is not the poor remnant of a sinful fall, but the beginning, the possibility, of all excellence. Such I FEEL to be the call. To it I respond with my whole being.

Yes! in the hands of men and women like our readers is the future. Let them, therefore, no longer hide their faces, shining with the rays of revelation, from a world in darkness.

"Thousand knights to do Him honour
Hath the Holy Ghost enrolled,
To fulfil His sacred purpose
Made their hearts with courage bold."

Let our readers add:—

"And ourselves are just such soldiers, Chosen of the Holy Ghost."

RECORDS OF PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

[In this column will be given from time to time such accounts of psychical phenomena as seem to be worthy of permanent record. Beyond the general classification indicated, no attempt at tabulation will at present be made; that work will follow in due course. In furtherance of this object we shall be pleased to receive from our readers brief reports of phenomena subject to two conditions (1) That a colourless statement of facts without comment is given; and (2) that communications are accompanied by the names and addresses of those concerned, not necessarily for publication, though we should naturally prefer to be at liberty to publish them. Amongst the phenomena referred to may be mentioned:—

CLASS C.—CLAIRVOYANCE.

[We thank our correspondent for this fine case of clairvoyance. It will be observed the vision may have passed from the coachman's mind to the lady's. How far is this "may" always present in clairvoyance? We should be glad if any of our readers can send us examples in which no other human mind but that of the subject can be conceived as taking part.]

In the early part of the year 1868, my carriage requiring painting, I gave directions to my coachman to take it to the coach-builder's, distant about twenty miles, for that purpose. Accordingly he started off early next morning. The man being most trustworthy, besides having been many years in my service, I felt perfect confidence in his safe conduct and thought no more about the matter. After breakfast I went out as usual to occupy myself with my favourite pursuit of gardening, and while so employed I distinctly saw a vision in mid-air, and seemingly at a distance; my carriage appeared being run away with by the horse, which was plunging and kicking violently, and taking his way by cross roads entirely free from all control, the coachman nowhere to be seen. Very much shocked, I ran into the drawing-room where my two daughters were sitting, and related to them the terrible vision I had just seen. They only laughed at what they considered my very unnecessary apprehensions, and both added: "You know what a careful man he is, and how very unlikely anything of the kind should happen." I tried to feel reassured, but found it impossible to forget what I had seen. Next morning the coachman presented himself in the deepest distress, and shedding tears he related what had happened. When half the journey had been got through he stopped at a wayside inn to bait his horse, and foolishly took the bridle off; some sudden noise under the carriage startled the horse, a very spirited animal, which quickly raising its head started off at a gallop; the poor man pursued, but soon distanced, lost sight of both horse and carriage. On the horse went at a furious pace, and after a mile or two, forsaking the main road, in consequence of an attempt to stop him by some people upon the road, dashed down a farm road, where he was driven into a ditch by labourers who rushed out of a field, frightening the horse so much that he attempted to jump the fence and was upset, and the carriage greatly injured.

CLASS O.—PSYCHOGRAPHY WITH SLADE.

- I. Inside two slates held above the table.
- II. Upon a slate not being touched by the medium.

While on a visit to America last month I took the opportunity of paying Slade a visit. Having made an appointment with him, I purchased a couple of slates in the town and went to his house (223, Shawmut Av., Boston) at two p.m., September 12th, as appointed. The main thing I wanted to do was to satisfy myself that the writing was done by some invisible intelligent force and not by any form of conjuring. I obtained no proof of identity, and I think that the signature given was probably forged by the power that wrote it, as nothing was given in the messages which really showed any signs of the presence of the person concerned. But I did not feel much concerned about the nature of the messages; all I wanted then was to get writing on my slates under conditions that would thoroughly satisfy me. I will here only describe the best attempts, which I think would have convinced almost anybody.

It was broad daylight, and Slade and I sat alone close to a window, on a bright, sunny afternoon. After various exhibitions on Mr. Slade's slates, I took mine, which had not been out of my sight, and which I had privately marked. I held them firmly together with my left hand (having previously put a bit of pencil inside) right up in the air close to my ear. Slade held the other end of them with his right hand, and then we joined our other two hands. I watched with the greatest care for any attempt at fraud; but there, as I held the slates in my hand and scrutinised them all over, I heard writing going on inside at a great pace, finishing up with raps. On opening the slates one was covered with a message purporting to be from a friend of mine. I had asked a question, but did not let Slade see it, and this question had evidently been seen by the supposed "spirit." I put the slate that was written on a side, and took the other one alone. I may mention here that the table appeared to be a common deal one, and I was allowed to do anything I liked to it and sit well back and look under it all the time. We kept all our legs turned away from the table and sat at a corner. This time I held this one slate under the corner of the table, and tight against the under side, with one hand; Slade held my other hand with both of his, and I carefully watched all his limbs. We soon got a message with the same signature, being an answer to a remark I made to Slade about the previous message. This time Slade did not touch the slate at all, and I took good care that nothing else meddled with it. I took the slates away and have them still. When I put the slate under the table alone first, something nearly pulled it out of my hand, and another or the same something gave my leg a very firm grip at the knee, which startled me considerably. The writing itself is interesting; the pencil wrote on one slate only when two were used, not marking the other at all; the t's are all crossed, and the i's dotted, the dots and crosses being quite isolated, so that the pencil must have been lifted, not merely dragged along, and the pace at which it was written was very surprising. Altogether, I think I obtained the writing in as satisfactory a way as I was able to devise when in a calm and matter-of-fact humour, and was convinced that Slade did not produce the writing. I experienced rather strange sensations, especially when I held the slates alone.

CLASS R.—SPEAKING IN TONGUES.

(See "LIGHT," October 3rd, 1885.)

When I sent those supposed South American words spoken by my daughter, I ought to have been more explicit and said how it was they were English words. When she began to speak in English, which she did later, she said that "moss" meant "hair," and another word "children." I will tell you what happened on the first occasion of her speaking in this unknown tongue, because I think it is a valuable fact and may be of use to others.

When the séance, as we supposed, was over, Jane, who had been our medium, and Hetty, left the room, and there only remained Edith, my daughter Winnie, and I. To my surprise Edie began again to speak in the "unknown tongue." Then she made passes over herself, but apparently they were of no use, for she shook her head and said some words in a melancholy tone, of which the word "Mollygo" was one often repeated. I began to feel frightened, and watched her anxiously as she tried more passes, and still could not be free. All at once, with what seemed a desperate effort, she cried, "Jane." I ran to summon back Jane and Hetty, and as soon as they came Edith stood up, patted herself on the head, and said, "My poor little girl"; then, turning to me, she said, "You must never do that, you will hurt Edie." Then she made rapid passes up over her face, and in a minute said in her usual voice, "I am all right now." I understood that I was never to let anyone leave the room until Edie had recovered, and we learnt afterwards that "Mollygo" meant Jane. My daughter said that she knew Jane was meant, but could not say it until she tried with all her might.

Afterwards, when we had sittings, she always began by speaking in this soft tongue; sometimes we recognised that it was verses she was saying by the rhyme and cadence; but after a while she always spoke in English, controlled by other spirits. In particular, my own little boy often spoke through her, and the previous unknown tongue was a proof to me of the genuineness of the latter; besides which, Edie was always very truthful and conscientious. Maurice told us of his occupations, and one day evidently conjugated a verb in some unknown tongue, and held long conversations with us.

CLASS R.—MISCELLANEOUS PHENOMENA.

Under this general heading we here give two more extracts from the letters of a lady, some of whose experiences we have already presented to our readers in our issue of October 3rd.

I.

I have often had messages either written or through the table which could not have been known to the medium or the sitters. For instance, four times the births of grandchildren at the Cape were told me within a few days after they occurred, and the correct date given, and the last one it was said "will be called after you." The child was called after me, and I got the news a fortnight after the séance.

I find that I have notes of these sittings which I enclose. [I asked if F. was confined? "Yes." What day? "Thirteenth." Girl or boy? "Girl." 16th. "F.; love, God bless all." 23rd. "My dear love to all." 26th. Nothing. 30th. "E. confined that day of a boy, Ernest with her."] Dates were told by tilts and raps. In each case the truth of these announcements was confirmed by letters from the Cape; my congratulatory letters to them reached them about the time that I received the news from them. In the third case my daughter E. told under control that A.'s little son would be born on such a day, which was afterwards verified. In each case I had been in ignorance of the exact time expected, did not know within a month or six weeks. In the fourth case there was a little confusion but of our making. M., the daughter to whom I have referred as being very sensitive, but who does not "sit," and only is impressed when I actually want help, either when suffering pain, which she can take away, or wanting advice.—M. said that I had another grandchild, "a little girl, she will be called after you." I thought this meant my daughter W. was confined, and wrote to congratulate her; but I was wrong; thought there was a mistake when a letter arrived from my son-in-law, telling me that A. had a little girl, which was so delicate that it was baptised when it was a few days old, after me. I will go and hunt up dates. I see that A.'s baby was born 13th. Now a friend of mine had died on the 7th, and it had been such a shock to me that I had been ill for days when I asked M. to try if she could take the pain away, so it must have been about the 13th. I am never in the dark, for some long time now—three or four years—but always in a dark room I can see light. I have at last come to the conclusion that this light comes from my own eyes, for it is wherever I look, yet at the same time I can see above my head, or from the corner of my eye—a sudden bright light, flash, or star. I believe that I really can see the air, it is always full of rapid motion, like a fine net of which every little globe is moving, and amongst it, or rather against it, as a background, I can see innumerable little points of light, faintly uminous clouds, and clusters of tiny stars. I wondered whether one light—a little denser than the rest, and seeming more stationary—was where my husband stood. I said nothing to anyone, but the next day, my girls having gone to church, I asked my niece if she would like to sit. So we did. Now she is a writing medium, and often writes with her left hand backwards. After sitting awhile her pencil wrote, "My W., I am most with you at night where you see the light." The next night when I saw this light I said, "Will you tell John King that I want to ask him a question?" Of course I said nothing to anyone, for this was a test to myself, and I waited anxiously the next day in hope of some sign. About the middle of the day, as I was sitting alone in the breakfast-room, working, M. suddenly came in, walked straight up to me, and throwing up her arm, and making the sign of the cross as this spirit always does through her, she said, "John King. What is it you want to know?" I said I wanted to know what I should do to get rid of the giddiness in my head. She said, "Go to Exeter to a good doctor, Dr. Cummings; he will tell you better than I can." I may say that I did go, and lost the giddiness. M. said she heard herself give the message, and thought she was going to say quite another name.

SPIRITISM VERSUS OTHER THEORIES.

(Being an answer to Messrs. von Hartmann, Myers, and Gurney.)

By THE HON. RODEN NOEL.

Much as I admire the ingenuity with which subtle minds invent theories for the purpose of evading the vulgar conclusion that genuine psychic manifestations are what they profess to be, I must still hold that conclusion more credible than are those theories themselves. But then the idea of personal immortality is not so inherently improbable to me that I feel called upon to execute all these amazing feats of mental gymnastic—to accomplish these portentous achievements of intellectual legerdemain—only in order to avoid it, I do not feel bound to exhaust all possible hypotheses before acquiescing in that which is most obviously suggested by the circumstances of the case. Nor can I even indulge the genuine philosophic scorn—doubtless appropriate to students enamoured of abstractions—for those who, like the majority of us, yearn for more assurance concerning that which faith, amid whatever difficulties, already grasps, the survival of our beloved, and the permanence of human love. I do think, however, that the persistent scepticism, and fertility in evasion displayed by some of the most distinguished of those who admit the facts, ought to teach Spiritists not to be too confident that the "new Basis" of their cherished belief is an all-sufficient foundation and quite incapable of disturbance. But as, on the whole, I share this belief with them and take their view of the phenomena, I desire to say something here on the most recent alternative hypotheses put forward by some who do not deny the facts, namely, the hypotheses of "telepathy" and "the unconscious secondary self."*

I often wonder if these ingenious writers have ever seriously asked themselves what they mean by the term "self," what the word really signifies. A "self" surely implies a conscious identification—or a potential conscious identification—of some given experience as yours or mine. If the word does not mean this, what does it signify? It denotes a claiming—or a potential claiming—of a given experience as yours and not mine, as mine and not yours. I am not a follower of Locke, but I do think the robust common-sense of that thinker has established this much in the essay on "Personal Identity." Locke's definition requires to be widened in order to include potential as well as actual conscious self-identification; but, so widened, I cannot conceive how the position can be controverted. One individual, or self, is a given self-identifying unity of experience, and, by the very nature of the conception, excludes the experience of another as belonging to him; though, indeed, by sympathy the first may conceive and share that of the second. Now if this be so, are not these writers either implicitly changing the essential, and commonly accepted connotation of the word "self," or else inadvertently describing the thing signified in a self-contradictory manner, when they propound their theories of a multiple, or secondary self? And if they have a meaning of their own for the word, let them say so. For is it, or is it not, true that the medium, or the persons present in the circle do, or can identify the phantoms appearing, or speaking, or writing in closed slates, with themselves? They certainly do, and can do, no such thing. Indeed, if they could, then again this theory of a "secondary" self would not apply, for the identification would be with the primary self. But the phantom or entity manifesting evidently identifies his action or speech with a self, or personality of his own; else he could give no connected answers, deliver no intelligible message, either in speech or writing. What is alleged, then, is that this "self," or personality, which appears to the medium (at the same moment in his ordinary waking state) to be different from himself, to answer his questions, or another's questions often unknown to him, communicates information and professes to give an account of itself, according to which it is not the medium but some other person—appearing also through objective sensible perception to several other persons, and not seeming to them identical with the medium,—that this personality is, however, the medium, but his "secondary," his "other" self. Now what is this "other" "secondary" self, which he cannot identify with his own ordinary self, which professes to be someone else, and which acts as if it were not he; which puts questions to him or answers his questions? How distinguish this "other" self of one individual from the ordinary self of quite another individual? In what sense can it be true that here we have one, and not two individuals? If there be two contemporaneous currents of consciousness that will not mingle, and which, so far from identifying, we are bound to distinguish, which, moreover, so far from being able to identify themselves as belonging to one conscious unity or self can only exclude each other as belonging each respectively to a different conscious unity or self, what is the justification for, what is the possible rationale of, alleging that they do not after all belong to two distinct, but to one individual or conscious unity, the very supposition being that they do belong to two, and not to one? I must own that to me, who lack the subtlety of these writers, anything more absolutely self-contradictory—and I was going to add absurd—cannot possibly be invented or conceived.

* But I need hardly say how I value the laborious work, careful research, and (as I believe) most important discoveries of the working members of that Psychical Society, to which I have the honour to belong.

Even if it were true, which, however, it is not, that no information is ever given in this way which has never been in the knowledge of the medium or of the circle (take Lord Erskine's ghost story in Lord Campbell's biography), this would in no way furnish a solution of the difficulty I here urge against such a hypothesis.* But then it may be said: what these writers contend for is not a second conscious, but a second unconscious self; to it they attribute these intelligent results. I would on this subject venture to refer my readers to my essay in the Academy (May 9th, 1885) on Von Hartmann's "Philosophy of the Unconscious." To me it is quite inconceivable that intelligence can be unconscious; that seems to me a contradiction in terms; and then, since effects must be proportionate to their causes, how can we refer intelligible effects to unconscious, unintelligent causes? But here we have intelligible effects—we have precisely similar effects, moreover, to those we attribute, in other cases, to conscious intelligence. Consciousness we know by experience as an actuality, as a vera causa. Self-consciousness assures us of it; and when we perceive the same, or similar phenomena (in other people) we at once attribute these to similar causes, or agents; that is a working hypothesis, too, which works very well. We speak our thoughts, we perform acts which are the result of thought, emotion, will; and when we hear other bodies speaking words which seem to express thoughts, because they are intelligible to us, or doing acts which seem the result of thought, emotion, will, like our own,—especially if they comprehend, and respond to us in an apposite manner,—we do not hesitate to attribute these bodily phenomena to conscious minds similar to our own; we do not hesitate to assume that these are other persons like ourselves; and we get on very well upon that assumption. Now in (genuine) psychic phenomena we observe precisely similar effects, effects apparently the result of conscious intelligence, because exactly like the results of it where we know ourselves to be concerned in the production of such effects, and exactly like the results of it where, to the best of our belief, other intelligent persons are concerned in them. Yet we, some of us, hesitate now so much to draw this conclusion that we prefer to attribute the phenomena in such instances to a cause which is not a vera causa at all, but an unverified hypothesis merely—one, moreover, to others of us at least, per se inconceivable, if not self-contradictory. The difference is no doubt that, in the case of other (so-called) living persons addressing us, we perceive, not only the manifestation of conscious intelligence apparently other than our own, but also the same sort of solid bodies and organs as we ourselves possess. But does it not argue, let us say at least some defect of imagination to conclude that, if these are absent, an alien intelligence cannot be present, though all other evidences tend to prove that it is? At all events, the question is whether the other hypothesis is more probable than this. Of course an idealist cannot hesitate for a moment which alternative to accept, for he knows that "matter," "body," is simply a perception or conception of the knowing and perceiving self or subject, of some individual thinker, while he is well aware also how this percept, or concept varies with the senses and knowing faculties of the subject, or person knowing. "Matter" is a very Proteus, and capable of assuming myriad forms, solid, fluid, gaseous, ethereal; and the very same matter which is perceptibly gross now, may be imperceptibly subtle a moment after, though clearly demonstrating its presence in other ways. Only a few even of the solar rays are palpable to us as colour—some being entirely beyond the scope of our present senses. The material world of a Laura Bridgeman is totally different from that of a Titian or a Raphael. But I will not insult the readers of "LIGHT" by insisting on such an A, B, C. It is strange, however, that subtle and learned thinkers like "C.C.M.," who fully admit the infinite possible variety of organism, rightly regarding it as only the objective expression, and, as it were, point of objective communication (according to capacity) with the outer world of some individual spirit, or soul (see his essay on "Symplemmata") should appear to prefer this curious and unverifiable hypothesis to the more obvious and verified hypothesis of Spiritism.

Here is an agent writing, let us say, an answer to a question on a closed slate, which, presumably, the medium knows nothing of, and to which in any case he does not, and cannot know the answer. Sometimes information may be given of which nobody present knows anything. But even if this were otherwise, surely the position taken by Mr. Myers (see Nineteenth Century) that an ingenious anagram was written automatically by a "secondary unconscious self" in answer to a question put by the normal and conscious self, is a somewhat gratuitous and extravagant one. Think what it involves. The question put by one division of myself is understood by the other division, or it could not be answered, and it is answered in a most round-about way, at first not even intelligible to the conscious division of myself, only understood by me after a time. But how was this question understood by the second division of myself without consciousness? And how was the elaborate and ingenious answer concocted equally without consciousness? All analogy suggests a conscious agency, and yet we are to assume one unconscious, even though that would presumably be impotent to produce this intelligible answer, so manifestly the effect of an agent intelligently responding to our own conscious question! It is our own answer, we are told, to our own question, but the answer of an "unconscious secondary self." But how, in what sense, is it the same self, since I am not conscious that the answer proceeded from myself at all? How is this unconscious ceer to be identified with our conscious self, which, if it be anything at all, is a continuous unity of experience self-identified, or capable of being self-identified, as belonging to one and the same self, or individual? But an unconscious self could not possibly be thus identified with a conscious. It must always remain alien, and outside consciousness; and therefore it cannot belong to the same self at all. It is simply a misnomer to call such an hypothetical entity a "secondary self," for it must belong to another sphere of being, or individuality altogether. The unconscious cannot identify itself with the conscious, nor vice versa. The answer now appears to us to come not from ourselves, but from some other; and it must ceer so appear; therefore, if personal identity consists in potential self-identification, there can be no question here of an identical self at all, and the answer must proceed, as it seems to do, from another agent, another self, or personality, altogether, and not from the same.

Just consider the grotesqueness of the notion! I inform myself through the muscles of my hand, with elaborate ingenuity, of what I did not know, and yet I did know—only without consciousness. My consciousness is informed through my hand communicating an intelligent and intelligible message to my mind through my senses—sight, touch, hearing—as if it came from outside; but it really comes from myself, though not from my mind, intelligence, or consciousness! What, then, is this unconscious self?

It must follow that I may be utterly irresponsible for what my mouth speaks, or my hand does, and yet it may be I who speak and do it, though unconsciously. The confusing and confounding nature of such a theory need scarcely be pointed out, for one division of me may then be an honest man, and the other a thief; one self a wise man, and the other a fool; and yet the one division remain irresponsible to, because cut off from all intercourse with and influence from, the other. Now, can you hang one part of me, and not the rest? Really this is too grotesque a notion to be seriously maintained or discussed, and possibly it is only meant as a clever skit, as a subtly-veiled reductio ad absurdum of a quasi-"scientific" hypothesis. Again, why should these secondary selves invariably pretend to be somebody else, systematically personate another individual? profess to be what they are not? This, surely, is quite inexplicable. Why gratuitously, and always untruthful? Or do they never know who they are themselves any more than we know that they are ourselves? Do they not know that they are ourselves any more than we know it? Perhaps after all the simplest solution—though a very commonplace one—is that they are no such thing. Charles II. and his bucket of water again!

Certainly the very idea makes one feel as mixed as, according to these writers, we verily are.

Von Hartmann's contention that two different parts of one brain support these two imaginary selves in one person (by the way, the theological mystery of the Trinity is nothing to the mysteries invented by the scientific mind! which both "confounds the persons, and divides the substance") is in no wise helpful in making this hypothesis clearer.

The difficulty is, how can two selves, who cannot identify themselves with each other, be yet one and the same self? That is a psychological, metaphysical problem, not a physiological. It helps not to be assured that they are respectively supported by two different parts of the same brain.* In that case, they are still two, not one. Or does personal identity then consist in identity of brain-substance? not in self-identifying memory, but in the identity of a spatially-extended phenomenon, or sensible appearance called brain? How then shall we be assured of this identity? Out of a self-identifying and comparing memory, what and where is it? Is personal identity dependent on a given continuity of space, then? And if so, at what limit of feet, or inches, does one identity stop, and another begin? But if in a given extent of brain we have two identities, why speak of them as one? I cannot, however, stop now to discuss at length the materialistic philosophy in any shape—non regimini di lor, ma guarda, e passa.

But Dr. von Hartmann seems to attribute the phenomena of Spiritism (see translation in "LIGHT," by Mr. Massey) not so much to his "unconscious," as to a certain "masked somnambulant consciousness." Therefore to his theory all my first objections apply with full force. Here are two distinct contemporaneous consciousnesses facing each other, and taking each other for distinct individuals. By no test of identity that I can even remotely imagine could such be proved to belong to one individual, and not two.

Of course, "unconscious cerebration" in any form "is the last thing" an idealist "will give into." In fact, he will never "give in" to it at all, because he must hold it to be intrinsically nonsense. An unconscious process cannot do the work of consciousness, cannot issue in results which we have experienced as the result of consciousness, and which we cannot conceive brought about in any other way. This is merely the old objection of Theists to atheistic materialism as a sufficient account of the intelligent and intelligible purposive processes in nature. And yet here is a still more extraordinary theory, because it is applied to man, to ourselves; seeing the only excuse for Atheism, as applied to nature, is that we are not in the secret of her subjectivity; but we are in the secret of our own. And yet we can ascribe intelligent, intelligible action to a mere material phenomenon (only conceivable as an idea of some mind or minds, with integrating, identifying, and distinguishing power) called brain; though we know that this brain-phenomenon is an actual accompaniment of our own normal conscious process. An idealist, at any rate, must hold that this cerebration, resulting in some intelligible message given through our own muscles, if the message does not proceed from our own consciousness, can only mean the operation of another consciousness not our own; for, as I have argued, the double simultaneous consciousness is inadmissible; and why should this particular content of our transcendent consciousness be sprung upon us through the muscles of our limbs, as if it came from outside, rather than directly influence us, as usual, by entering the current of normal experience through our brain? Besides, in my own view the brain, so far as it is not phenomenon or appearance in our own consciousness, is necessarily phenomenon or appearance in another, or rather in many others, and, therefore, necessarily implies their mediation in the processes of our own thought. Why, then, should we exclude arbitrarily the operation of that very intelligence, who seems, and claims to be giving a message through automatic writing, or planchette?

DR. VON HARTMANN ON SPIRITISM.

Spiritualists should be much indebted to Mr. Massey for the labour he has given to the translation into English of the important pamphlet of Dr. von Hartmann on Spiritism.

Mr. Massey describes this pamphlet as "the most formidable attack that Spiritualism has had yet to encounter."

The attack does not appear to me so formidable as it is

* If a gaslion in my cerebellum, or if my spinal cord, or if the optic thalamus have a consciousness of their own, at all events that is not my consciousness, though it may enter as integral factor into mine, when mine has moulded and appropriated it.

careful, honest, and methodical; but if the attack be so formidable, then, if defeated, that victory will logically be the greatest yet achieved by Spiritualism.

Dr. von Hartmann's view is that the existence of the personal and immortal spirits of men is, at least, "very improbable," and that, therefore, the phenomena called Spiritual are almost certainly the result of what may be considered as the psycho-cerebral powers inherent in mediums.

Now regarding this theory, I may be permitted to say, that so long ago as 1872, at a meeting of the committee of the Dialectic Society appointed to investigate and report on modern so-called Spiritualistic phenomena, I met the late Mr. Serjeant Cox, and suggested to him that the phenomena called Spiritual did not demonstrate the existence of disembodied spirits, because we, as living men, were spiritual beings, and in virtue of our spiritual nature might have occult powers unknown to our normal selves, as was shown in somnambulism and clairvoyance.

Again, in 1877, I read a paper (now incorporated in my "Theosophy"), under the title "Man as a Spirit," in which, at length, I attempted to show how living men, as spiritual beings, might be able to produce spiritualistic phenomena.

I may be excused for recalling these facts as they will show that I have no prejudice against Professor von Hartmann's theory to a certain measure; but I differ from the author in this, that while he would attribute all Spiritualistic phenomena to the powers inherent in living men, I, on the contrary, have always maintained that if such powers are possible with men in the body, they should be much more possible with men when freed from the encumbrance of the concrete body.

For instance, granting that it may be possible for the spiritual nature of the medium to write within closed and sealed slates by an occult power beyond and independent of any known physical law, it seems only reasonable to suppose that this power must be increased when the spirit is independent of its physical impediments.

Although Dr. von Hartmann's pamphlet is worthy of much consideration, not only as being the production of a trained thinker, but by reason of its philosophic spirit, still, as the author reasons only on the evidence of others, and has himself had no experimental experience of the subject, his reasonings cannot be accepted as those of a specialist or expert.

I must leave it for others to follow the arguments throughout the many pages and varied illustrations given in the pamphlet, and will content myself with giving in the briefest form I can, my reasons for believing in the existence and actions of personal disembodied spirits.

1. It has always seemed to me that the almost universal belief in all ages and in all countries in the existence of spiritual beings, and in the immortality of the soul, shows the existence of an instinct in man necessary to his spiritual welfare, and therefore to be regarded as in harmony with his nature, and therefore to be as true as the instincts implanted in the lower animals, and which are necessary to their physical welfare and existence.

2. The universal belief in ghosts in all ages and in all countries is an argument of like kind, with this support, that haunting ghosts have been scientifically proved to be objective facts, and rational and moral beings.

3. The existence of solid and strong beings materialised in the presence of mediums, and seen in the light, who speak and act with energy equal to that of ordinary human beings, and are in all respects like human beings, and are yet not the somnambulant medium because they are seen in the light in company with the medium, are, when demonstrated, direct refutations of Dr. von Hartmann's theory. I admit, however, that in this record such complete evidence is as yet, so far as my experience extends, extremely rare.

4. The existence of the double at the distance of miles from its solid living counterpart, is a fact frequently established, and when seen distinctly in the light by more than one witness, and independent of suggestion, refutes the theory of Dr. Hartmann of subjective hallucination.

5. The fact that there are very many intelligent, honest, and healthy human beings who see spirits and describe them as real objective beings, whose form possesses a clearness of outline and an apparent solidity of body surpassing that of ordinary human beings, is presumptive evidence that such beings exist, and the sceptic who does not see such beings has no more logical right to deny their existence than the man colour-blind has a right to assert that there is no difference between the colour of the blossoms and the leaves of a red geranium, as a friend of mine now does. True, there is a greater consensus of belief as to the existence of a colour called red, but the quality of the evidence is the same as to the objective reality of visible spiritual beings.

6. Lastly, I myself have had the experience of being outside my human body, on which occasion I stood in form about six feet distant from my body, and most distinctly saw my human body and my soul-body at one and the same time. I therefore know that the spirit of man, as a rational soul, can exist as the ego outside and independently of his human body.

WHAT IS SAID OF PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

J. H. FICHTE, THE GERMAN PHILOSOPHER AND AUTHOR.—"Notwithstanding my age (83) and my exemption from the controversies of the day, I feel it my duty to bear testimony to the great fact of Spiritualism. No one should keep silent."

PROFESSOR DE MORGAN, PRESIDENT OF THE MATHEMATICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.—"I am perfectly convinced that I have both seen and heard, in a manner which should make unbelief impossible, things called spiritual, which cannot be taken by a rational being to be capable of explanation by imposture, coincidence, or mistake. So far I feel the ground firm under me."

DR. ROBERT CHAMBERS.—"I have for many years known that these phenomena are real, as distinguished from impostures; and it is not of yesterday that I concluded they were calculated to explain much that has been doubtful in the past; and, when fully accepted, revolutionise the whole frame of human opinion on many important matters."—Extract from a Letter to A. Russell Wallace.

PROFESSOR HARE, EMERITUS PROFESSOR OF CHEMISTRY IN THE UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA.—"Far from abating my confidence in the inferences respecting the agencies of the spirits of deceased mortals, in the manifestations of which I have given an account in my work, I have, within the last nine months" (this was written in 1858), "had more striking evidences of that agency than those given in the work in question."

PROFESSOR CHALLIS, THE LATE PLUMERIAN PROFESSOR OF ASTRONOMY AT CAMBRIDGE.—"I have been unable to resist the large amount of testimony to such facts, which has come from many independent sources, and from a vast number of witnesses. . . . In short, the testimony has been so abundant and consistent, that either the facts must be admitted to be such as are reported, or the possibility of certifying facts by human testimony must be given up."—Clerical Journal, June, 1862.

PROFESSOR GREGORY, F.R.S.E.—"The essential question is this, What are the proofs of the agency of departed spirits? Although I cannot say that I yet feel the sure and firm conviction on this point which I feel on some others, I am bound to say that the higher phenomena, recorded by so many truthful and honourable men, appear to me to render the spiritual hypothesis almost certain. . . . I believe that if I could myself see the higher phenomena alluded to I should be satisfied, as are all those who have had the best means of judging of the truth of the spiritual theory."

LORD BROUGHAM.—"There is but one question I would ask the author, Is the Spiritualism of this work foreign to our materialistic, manufacturing age? No; for amidst the varieties of mind which divers circumstances produce are found those who cultivate man's highest faculties; to these the author addresses himself. But even in the most cloudless skies of scepticism I see a rain-cloud, if it be no bigger than a man's hand; it is modern Spiritualism."—Preface by Lord Brougham to "The Book of Nature." By C. O. Groom Napier, F.C.S.

THE LONDON DIALECTICAL COMMITTEE reported: "1. That sounds of a very varied character, apparently proceeding from articles of furniture, the floor and walls of the room—the vibrations accompanying which sounds are often distinctly perceptible to the touch—occur, without being produced by muscular action or mechanical contrivance. 2. That movements of heavy bodies take place without mechanical contrivance of any kind, or adequate exertion of muscular force by those present and frequently without contact or connection with any person. 3. That these sounds and movements often occur at the time and in the manner asked for by persons present, and, by means of a simple code of signals, answer questions and spell out coherent communications."

PROFESSOR BARRETT, F.R.S.E.—"I know and rejoice in the blessing Spiritualism has been to my own faith, and to that of several dear friends of mine. Moreover, I cordially recognise the fact that in bereavement and deep distress numbers have been cheered and consoled by the hope that Spiritualism has set before them. . . . So far from Materialism being true, I do not believe a single person has ever yet lived on this earth who has truly and heartily desired to know if an intelligent and personal existence be possible without our present bodily organism, and has steadily set himself to solve this supreme question with all the help he can gain from every source.—I say I do not believe any such earnest seeker after truth has ever failed to obtain a clear and definite answer in the affirmative."

CAMILLE FLAMMARION, THE FRENCH ASTRONOMER, AND MEMBER OF THE ACADEMIE FRANCAISE.—"I do not hesitate to affirm my conviction, based on personal examination of the subject, that any scientific man who declares the phenomena denominated 'magnetic,' 'somnambulant,' 'mediumic,' and others not yet explained by science to be 'impossible,' is one who speaks without knowing what he is talking about; and also any man accustomed, by his professional avocations, to scientific observation—provided that his mind be not blinded by pre-conceived opinions, nor his mental vision blinded by that opposite kind of illusion, unhappily too common in the learned world, which consists in imagining that the laws of Nature are already known to us, and that everything which appears to overstep the limit of our present formulas is impossible—may acquire a radical and absolute certainty of the reality of the facts alluded to."

CROMWELL F. VARLEY, F.R.S.—"Twenty-five years ago I was a hard-headed unbeliever. . . . Spiritual phenomena, however, suddenly and quite unexpectedly, were soon after developed in my own family. . . . This led me to inquire and to try numerous experiments in such a way as to preclude, as much as circumstances would permit, the possibility of trickery and self-deception. . . . He then details various phases of the phenomena which had come within the range of his personal experience, and continues: "Other and numerous phenomena have occurred, proving the existence (a) of forces unknown to science; (b) the power of instantly reading my thoughts; (c) the presence of some intelligence or intelligences controlling those powers. . . . That the phenomena occur there is overwhelming evidence, and it is too late now to deny their existence."

ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, F.G.S.—"My position, therefore, is that the phenomena of Spiritualism in their entirety do not require further confirmation. They are proved, quite as well as any facts are proved in other sciences, and it is not denial or quibbling that can disprove any of them, but only fresh facts and accurate deductions from those facts. When the opponents of Spiritualism can give a record of their researches approaching in duration and completeness to those of its advocates; and when they can discover and show in detail, either how the phenomena are produced or how the many sane and able men here referred to have been deluded into a coincident belief that they have witnessed them; and when they can prove the correctness of their theory by producing a like belief in a body of equally sane and able unbelievers—then, and not till then, will it be necessary for Spiritualists to produce fresh confirmation of facts which are, and always have been, sufficiently real and indisputable to satisfy any honest and persevering inquirer."—Miracles and Modern Spiritualism.

DR. LOCKHART ROBERTSON.—"The writer" (i.e., Dr. L. Robertson) "can now no more doubt the physical manifestations of so-called Spiritualism than he would any other fact, as, for example, the fall of the apple to the ground, of which his senses informed him. As stated above, there was no place or chance of any legend, or fraud, in these physical manifestations. He is aware, even from recent experience, of the impossibility of convincing anyone, by a mere narrative of events apparently so out of harmony with all our knowledge of the laws which govern the physical world, and he places these facts on record rather as an act of justice due to those whose similar statements he had elsewhere doubted and denied, than with either the desire or hope of convincing others. Yet he cannot doubt the ultimate recognition of facts of the truth of which he is so thoroughly convinced. Admit these physical manifestations, and a strange and wide world of research is opened to our inquiry. This field is new to the materialist mind of the last two centuries, which even in the writings of divines of the English Church, doubts and denies all spiritual manifestations and agencies, be they good or evil."—From a letter by Dr. Lockhart Robertson, published in the Dialectical Society's Report on Spiritualism, p. 24.

NASSAU WILLIAM SENIOR.—"No one can doubt that phenomena like these (Phrenology, Homoeopathy, and Mesmerism) deserve to be observed, recorded, and arranged; and whether we call by the name of mesmerism, or by any other name, the science which proposes to do this, is a mere question of nomenclature. Among those who profess this science there may be careless observers, prejudiced recorders and rash systematisers; their errors and defects may impede the progress of knowledge, but they will not stop it. And we have no doubt that, before the end of this century, the wonders which perplex almost equally those who accept and those who reject modern mesmerism will be distributed into defined classes, and found subject to ascertained laws—in other words, will become the subjects of a science." These views will prepare us for the following statement, made in the Spiritual Magazine, 1864, p. 336: "We have only to add, as a further tribute to the attainments and honours of Mr. Senior, that he was by long inquiry and experience a firm believer in spiritual power and manifestations. Mr. Home was his frequent guest, and Mr. Senior made no secret of his belief among his friends. He it was who recommended the publication of Mr. Home's recent work by Messrs. Longmans, and he authorised the publication, under initials, of one of the striking incidents there given, which happened to a near and dear member of his family."

WHAT CONJURERS SAY ABOUT PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

Mediums, who are the instruments of an external agency, have, more than once, been confronted with conjurers who deceive by sleight of hand; and in the same manner that no man of science who has thoroughly and fairly investigated the phenomena has failed to become convinced of their reality, so no conjurer who has been confronted with the same facts has been able to explain their occurrence by prestidigitization. Houdin, Jacobs, Bellachini, Hermann, Kellar, and others have already confessed their powerlessness to produce under the same conditions what occurs without human intervention in the presence of a medium.

Testimony of Robert Houdin.

The Marquis Endes de Mirville published during the lifetime of Houdin two letters from the latter, in his "Mémoire adressé à MM. les membres de l'Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques, sur un grand nombre de phénomènes merveilleux intéressant également la Religion, la Science, et les hommes du Monde," in which the conjurer confesses his inability to explain the phenomena he witnessed in the presence of Alexis, the clairvoyant. A circumstantial account is given of M. de Mirville's visit to Houdin for the purpose of engaging him in this investigation, of the latter's confidence in his own ability to detect the trick, and of what took place at the séance, the conditions of which were entirely under Houdin's control. This account extends over twelve pages, and its accuracy is confirmed by Houdin in the first of the documents now translated:—

"Although very far from accepting the eulogies which M.—— is good enough to bestow upon me, and especially insisting that I am not at all committed to opinions, either in favour of magnetism or against it, I can, nevertheless, not refrain from declaring that the facts above reported are entirely correct (sont de la plus complète exactitude), and that, the more I reflect upon them, the more impossible I find it to rank them among those which belong to my art and profession.

4th May, 1847.

ROBERT HOUDIN."

A fortnight later, M. de Mirville received another letter, in which the following, referring to another séance, occurs:—

"I have, therefore, returned from this séance as astonished as it is possible to be, and persuaded that it is utterly impossible that chance or skill could ever produce effects so wonderful (tout à fait impossible que le hasard ou l'adresse puisse jamais produire des effets aussi merveilleux).—I am, monsieur, &c.,

May 16th, 1847.

(Signed), ROBERT HOUDIN."

Testimony of Harry Kellar.

Harry Kellar, a distinguished professor of legerdemain, investigated the slate-writing phenomena which occurred in the presence of Mr. Eglinton, at Calcutta, in January, 1882, and on the 25th of that month he addressed a letter to the editor of the Indian Daily News, in which he said:—

"In your issue of the 13th January I stated that I should be glad of an opportunity of participating in a séance with a view of giving an unbiased opinion as to whether, in my capacity of a professional prestidigitator, I could give a natural explanation of effects said to be produced by spiritual aid.

"I am indebted to the courtesy of Mr. Eglinton, the Spiritualistic medium now in Calcutta, and of his host, Mr. J. Meugens, for affording me the opportunity I craved.

"It is needless to say I went as a sceptic, but I must own that I have come away utterly unable to explain, by any natural means, the phenomena that I witnessed on Tuesday evening. I will give a brief description of what took place."

After describing several successful experiments, Mr. Kellar proceeds:—

"In respect to the above manifestations, I can only say that I do not expect my account of them to gain general credence. Forty-eight hours before I should not have believed anyone who described such manifestations under similar circumstances. I still remain a sceptic as regards Spiritualism, but I repeat my inability to explain or account for what must have been an intelligent force that produced the writing on the slate, which, if my senses are to be relied on, was in no way the result of trickery or sleight of hand."

On the 30th of the same month Mr. Kellar addressed another letter to the Indian Daily News, reporting some experiences of another kind with Mr. Eglinton, and regarding which he said:—

"In conclusion, let me state that after a most stringent trial and strict scrutiny of these wonderful experiences I can arrive at no other conclusion than that there was no trace of trickery in any form; nor was there in the room any mechanism or machinery by which could be produced the phenomena which had taken place. The ordinary mode by which Maskelyne and other conjurers imitate levitation or the floating test could not possibly be done in the room in which we were assembled."

The Testimony of Professor Jacobs.

Professor Jacobs, writing to the editor of Licht, mehr Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—

"Spite of the assertions, more or less trustworthy, of the French and English journalists, and spite of the foolish jealousies of ignorant conjurers, I feel it my duty to show up the bad faith of one party and the chicanery of the other. All that has been said or done adverse to these American mediums is absolutely untrustworthy. If we would rightly judge of a thing we must understand it, and neither the journalists nor the conjurers possessed the most elementary knowledge of the science that governs these phenomena. As a prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the medianimic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect.

"Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. If (as I have every reason to hope) the psychical studies, to which I am applying myself at this time, succeed, I shall be able to establish clearly, and that by public demonstration, the immense line of demarcation which separates mediumistic phenomena from conjuring proper, and then equivocation will be no longer possible, and persons will have to yield to evidence, or deny through predetermination to deny."

"Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also the individuality of the spirit in 'spiritual manifestation.' I authorise you, dear sir, to insert this letter in your next number, if agreeable to you," &c., &c.

Testimony of Samuel Bellachini.

Samuel Bellachini, Court Conjurer at Berlin, made the following declaration in December, 1877:—

"I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Berne; Butlerof, in St. Petersburg, to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the 'How' of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a notary and witnesses.

"Berlin, December 6th, 1877.

(Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI."

ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By "M.A. (Oxon.)."

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct séances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experiences in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two, of negative, passive temperament, and preferably of the female sex, the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each sitter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Scepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitter spirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear. Patience is essential, and it may be necessary to meet ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such a trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful séance.

The first indications of success usually are a cold breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twitchings of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not aiding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over, but not in contact with, it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if the attempt to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might disconcert an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will check noisy manifestations.

Lastly, Try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your reason. Do not enter into a very solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well-grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.

THE INFLUENCE OF PSYCHICAL RESEARCH ON THE DOMINANT CULTURE.

BEING THE TRANSLATOR'S PREFACE TO DR. HARTMANN'S
"SPIRITISM."

The author of this pamphlet needs no introduction to the already large and increasing number of English readers who interest themselves in philosophy and its problems. He has almost certainly the widest influence on speculative thought in Germany of any contemporary writer. In this country his great work—though it has had later developments—has become accessible to a larger circle of readers through the recent translation by Mr. Coupland, of its ninth edition. The extensive acquaintance with the principles and results of modern science, which Dr. von Hartmann combines with high philosophical capacity, must impart to his opinions additional interest and authority. In this respect he is comparable to our own eminent philosopher, Mr. Herbert Spencer.

But however distinguished the author, to many it will seem that the subject of his present intellectual undertaking requires some apology. It is really in this very circumstance that the justification is to be found. The disregard of facts which only ignorance can any longer honestly deny, and which, whatever their true significance, must stand in important relation to very deep problems, is hardly less than scandalous to the thought and science of the age. However long this may have been felt and said, it would still seem presumptuous for any individual unsustained by authority to pronounce such a judgment. But the authority has recently become so imposing as indeed almost to remove the reproach itself. In this country, the Society for Psychical Research, an embodiment of the sentiment referred to,* has, within the last three years drawn to its ranks, and within its governing body, some of the most eminent representatives of science, philosophy, and literature. The number of its members and associates has been steadily increasing, similar societies are even now in course of formation, under the best leadership, in other countries, and less organised attempts in the same direction are engaging the energies of competent investigators in many quarters. From the public Press, representing the older and still dominant culture of the "Aufklärung," with its virtual denial of everything which could not be at once explained, or its shallow attempts to refer every phenomenal mystery to credulity and fraud, there has been little or no encouragement. Everything, on the contrary, which could discredit a subject peculiarly exposed to discredit has been eagerly seized upon, while the weighty evidence, which only students of the subject knew, they were seldom allowed to bring forward, except in books which were scarcely ever reviewed, and therefore remained unknown and unread by the public. Journals and periodicals there were, devoted to collection and discussion of the evidence as it arose, but these, again, were not allowed fair play. The great firm, for instance, which has the monopoly of the sale of literature to the travelling public, has never allowed any paper or book dealing with this subject to be exhibited on its stalls, nor will it even supply them to order. Papers ministering to the vulgarest frivolity of the populace are displayed, but such a journal as "LIGHT," for which the following translation was expressly prepared by authority of one of the most influential thinkers of the age, is not respectable enough for the fastidious vendors of Rare Bits, Tit Bits, and Bird o' Freedom.† In short, there has been a general consent that "Spiritualism" should be hustled out of sight, or be referred to only in terms of contempt, or for display of journalistic wit and superiority to "superstition." Nor has this opposition been at all conciliated by attempts to discriminate facts from their spiritistic interpretation.

It is hardly a serious imputation on journalists that they are subject to the prevailing intellectual influences. Greater responsibility falls on those whose profession it is to welcome every foundation of fact for the discovery or recognition of truth. It will be an historical reproach to the Royal Society that it refused a hearing to Mr. Crookes' paper "On the Experimental Investigation of a New Force," and to the British Association for the Advancement of Science that the admission of Professor Barrett's paper "On some Phenomena associated with Abnormal Conditions of Mind," actually led to a revision of the rules, with the object of preventing the Association from being similarly "compromised" in future.

In Germany, the prejudice was exasperated a few years ago by the publication, by the late Professor Zöllner, of the report of his systematic investigation with the medium, Henry Slade.* To great scientific attainments and capacity, Zöllner united a very sensitive disposition, and it seems probable that the literary and private persecution which ensued conduced to his premature death. Intellectually and morally opposed to more than one of the prevailing tendencies of thought and practice, he turned on his assailants with a polemic which was not free from asperity, and in which the different topics of controversy, connected in Zöllner's view by a common derivation of the pernicious influences he was contesting, were mixed up with more abstract disquisitions. This circumstance, it will be seen, is considered by Dr. von Hartmann, somewhat to detract from Zöllner's value as a witness. That is, as I submit, a very unnecessary concession to an "invention of the enemy," that Zöllner was mad! a report which was spread after his death with no better justification than the impossibility of otherwise impairing the cogency of his evidence for the phenomena of "Spiritism." It is emphatically denied and conclusively disproved by the testimony of well-known men who were in intimate correspondence with Zöllner up to the time of his death. I refer to the report in this place, as well because Hartmann's remark might be thought to give some possible colour to it, as also because it was stated as a fact by a German physiologist in the Contemporary Review a year or two ago. It is absolutely baseless.

In some of his investigations with Slade (subsequent, by the bye, to the occurrences which drove Slade from this country, and with which Zöllner was fully and exactly acquainted), Zöllner was associated with the distinguished men of science, Wilhelm Weber and Fechner, who added their testimony to his. The first professional conjurer in Germany, Samuel Bellachini, after prolonged investigation with Slade, also declared, by formal affidavit, the facts he had witnessed to be inexplicable by the resources of his art.

It was about this time that the public exhibitions of the "magnetiser," Hansen, drew fresh attention to the long dormant subject of mesmerism. In Germany, France, and England, some men of science reverted to the old experiments of Braid, and while still denying the specific influence of mesmerism, acknowledged, as completely proved and exempt from charlatanry, the extraordinary effects producible by suggestion in the state called hypnotism. The important development of this branch of psychology by Dr. Falmesstock, in the United States of America—who gave the apt term, "Statuvolence"—is adverted to by Hartmann in the text.

The next fact experimentally established was "thought-transference," without physical contact, and, therefore, without the possibility of involuntary muscular suggestions; the results of the Society for Psychical Research in this country being confirmed by the independent investigations of M. Richet, in Paris.

Meanwhile the psychology of the abnormal conditions termed in general "sommnambule" was being studied by philosophers. The recently published work "Die Philosophie der Mystik," by Dr. Carl du Prel, of Munich, has the merit, quite apart from the author's theory of individual transcendental subjectivity, of showing the psychological continuity of the various states of sleeping consciousness, from ordinary dream to the wonderful faculties revealed by speech and action in the deepest somnambule trance, as also the connection of these subjective phenomena with some occasionally observed in delirium and insanity. The discovery of this continuity and connection makes entirely credible, and even à priori probable, the statements of many medical observers of somnambule patients,‡ which have long been ignored or rejected as incredible, by one side, while by another they have been accepted as demonstrating a world of spirits. Profoundly interesting is du Prel's exposition of this second consciousness in man, familiar to all in its weakest degree as common dream, but rising in clearness, coherence, and intensity in exact proportion as the organ of waking consciousness is numbed, and its functions are suppressed.

Another writer of philosophical repute in Germany, noted for his investigations of mediumistic phenomena, is Baron Lazar B. Hellenbach. His experience and conclusions are embodied in a work published at about the same time as du Prel's,

* I do not by this mean to imply that this Society is already committed to the so-called Spiritualistic phenomena. That is not the case.

† I hope I have not done injustice to these publications. I confess I have not studied them, but the titles are suggestive, and they are to be found on Messrs. Smith and Co.'s bookstalls.

* See my translation, "Transcendental Physics," which can be obtained at the Psychological Press Association, 16, Craven-street, Charing Cross.

‡ Selections of this evidence will be found in du Prel's work, of which I have nearly completed a translation, to be published, I hope, before long.

entitled "Geburt und Tod als Wechsel der Anschauungsform oder die Doppel-natur des Menschen" (Birth and Death; as Change of Perceptual Form; or the Double-nature of Man). His hypothesis of a "Meta-organism" is allowed by Hartmann (who, nevertheless, considers it very improbable) to make the survival of the individual, after physical dissolution, scientifically conceivable.

The permissible space of a preface would be much exceeded by the enumeration of all, even of the more notable, indications that the dominant culture has failed to arrest observation and recognition of phenomena which are, indeed, of constant and natural recurrence. Sooner or later the human mind emancipates itself from the tyranny of intellectual conventionality, and the process is quickened when leaders of thought, like the author of this pamphlet, are in open sympathy with the revolt.

To gain the subject in hand a hearing, that public recognition of the value of study and research in it may be the sooner arrived at, is one object I have had in view in undertaking this translation. Hartmann's demand for State-appointed commissions of investigation is more appropriate to conditions of scientific research in Germany than to those obtaining in this country. Nor otherwise is it a very hopeful proposal. For success in this inquiry those who undertake it should in general be qualified by sympathies and interests intimately concerned in the elicitation of the phenomena. The mere physicist, or physiological psychologist, is too little likely to touch the springs of the subtle forces which are liberated by mental, though not always conscious, dispositions. The recognition of a relatively unconscious mentality, in connection with the organic forces which are certainly instrumental, suffices to bring into view the peculiar difficulties of the investigation. It would be the grossest mistake to assume, however, that only emotional and unmetrical partisans of mediums are therefore likely to meet with a success which they would thus be unqualified to verify satisfactorily for others. But the demand for scientific examination of this subject usually assumes that nothing more is requisite than habits of observation and acuteness acquired in physical experimentation. Yet it is quite likely that of two men equally qualified by such training, one shall have uniform success, and the other uniform disappointment with mediums. A very strong professional medium, through whom certain habitual phenomena are regularly elicited, may still obtain them without the assistance of rapport, that is, with quite neutral visitors, but a hostile will, however disguised, can paralyse the medium's forces, or deflect them in the possibly compromising direction which, by expecting, it in fact dictates. This applies to the suspicion of prejudice, but not to the suspicion, if such it can be called, of wary and critical observation by a fair mind. Thus sinister suspicion is very frequently gratified by the result, if any result at all there is; and this I believe to be the true explanation of some notable "exposures." People who cannot recognise in mental dispositions positive forces, acting by irresistible mesmeric suggestion upon a sensitive subject, have no business with experiments in which the psychological factor predominates. Least of all is this factor to be ignored in the case of investigators of remarkable distinction, because the very force of character which has conduced to success in their own departments of activity makes it unlikely that they will be psychically passive or neutral witnesses.

It is accordingly to be hoped that there will be no such scientific commissions as Dr. von Hartmann proposes, until these incidents of the research have become thoroughly understood. Voluntary organisations may be more effectual, because originating in a genuine interest. But even in these success will be rather individual than collective, and it is probable that the best observations will not be those of committees selected chiefly on account of the authority their names would carry with the public. Such considerations are natural, but they ignore the fact that every member of the committee, as soon as he enters the séance-room, is a "psychic" only in a less degree than the medium himself, and should be a co-efficient in the results. Hartmann is undoubtedly right in asserting this co-efficiency, though it is of very various degrees, and is often not at all apparent. To these degrees of co-efficiency correspond degrees of counteracting influence, leading to failure or to questionable results. While I quite admit that professional mediumship has been disgraced by many conscious frauds, and must always be narrowly watched on account of the temptations offered by uncritical observation, it is my conviction that cruel injustice has often resulted from mere ignorance of psychological dynamics.

On the other hand, the author's theory of transferred and collective hallucinations at séances reverses the true position of the parties, making the medium stand to the others in the relation of mesmeriser to his subjects. It is, indeed, no logical answer to Hartmann that experienced investigators would unanimously disagree with him (who has here no experience) on this point, because the theory itself requires that the greater the experience, the greater are the probability and force of such psychological deceptions. But his analogies do not help him: hallucinations of all the senses, combined into a single object, perceived uninterruptedly for a length of time, and similarly by a number of observers, have not, I believe, been independently established. Nor is it easy to suppose that Mr. Crookes and his friends, for instance, were thus hallucinated by the little Florence Cook, to the extent described.

Nevertheless, the facts of somnambulism, and the field of psychology to which they introduce us in relation to mediumistic phenomena, have certainly been too much neglected by Spiritualists. Herein they have been neither more nor less wise than other people. As long as man's ideal life is supposed to be limited to the content of his waking consciousness, it is inevitable that whatever exceeds this content, either in the deeper states of dream or in communications obtained through mediums, should be ascribed to foreign intelligences. Only recently and partially has the organic "threshold" of consciousness been recognised, and the insight been gained that all which lies behind that threshold—the "unconscious cerebration" of Carpenter—or the "latent thought" of Hamilton—is only not conscious in the sense that it has not attained the reflective moment of consciousness, and is thus not yet associated with the self-consciousness. How large, and in what relations with nature and other subjects, may be this unappropriated sphere of individual being, it must belong to a more mature metaphysic and psychology to determine. We have at present only to remember that Hartmann's postulate that the consciousness behind the normal threshold—or the "somnambulant" consciousness—is supported by a part of the brain whose functional activities are only "masked" by those of the parts supporting waking consciousness, is a mere physiological assumption. That the "unconscious" ideal processes go on during waking life, being indeed only "masked" by the impressions of the latter, is doubtless a fact sustained by presumption, analogy, and psychological evidence. But the "supporter" of this relatively unconscious or somnambulant ideality is entirely problematical. It may be a substance which we can represent organically, and which yet has no organic dependence on the brain, and may survive the disintegration of the latter, appropriating then the self-consciousness and personality of the individual. The intimate connection with the brain, or at least with some part of the physical organism,* which this hypothetical "meta-organism" must certainly have, is not necessarily, or even presumably, a relation of dependence. The recognition of finer forms of matter than can affect our physical sensibility must carry with it the possibility of their organic constitution, and this possibility may be raised to the rank of a necessary hypothesis by the more profound psychology for which somnambulism seems to offer a foundation.†

It must be a question for psychologists, if not for metaphysicians, whether Hartmann has not ascribed to the "masked" somnambulant consciousness (the ideal process behind, yet co-existing with, the waking consciousness), powers which, by the very laws of consciousness, can only belong either to the external or to the internal waking state; that is, to ordinary self-conscious thought, or to the self-consciousness of "open" somnambulism. Analysis of consciousness yields two moments, the direct and the reflective. The latter, which is the recognition and characterisation of the thought—its "second intention," in the language of the schoolmen;—seems to be essential for the motivation of all actions of apparent intelligence, other, that is, than the automatic actions which have merely reflex movements at their foundation. A thought unrecognised and unattached to the self-consciousness may indeed pass into an action appropriate to it (as in the simplest phenomenon of planchette writing, &c.), and this idea-motive process may go on spontaneously as long as it depends simply on the uninterrupted current of automatic thought behind the "threshold." But if, now, it becomes a question of a fresh process suggested from without, of response, for instance, to another intelligence, it is difficult to conceive this happening without the second moment of mentality, the recognition of meaning, by which alone, it seems, a responsive association of ideas could be started, and a new set of actions could be set up. If here that second moment of consciousness is really, as I submit, requisite, it is evident that for all the more advanced phenomena of this province Hartmann's "masked" somnambulism is nothing less than a contemporaneous second intelligence, wanting nothing that belongs to full self-conscious personality. It is a second Ego in no subjectively deficient sense of the word. For we cannot conceive the intelligent recognition of a thought unaccompanied by a self-consciousness. In "open" somnambulism we undoubtedly find this full intelligence, but in that state the ordinary physical Ego-consciousness is dormant.

* Some somnambules have placed the seat of abnormal consciousness and its perceptions in the region of the solar plexus.

† On this whole subject du Prel's "Philosophie der Mystik" offers very instructive considerations.

‡ The distinction is admirably brought out and explained by Mr. Shadworth Hodgson, as well in his "Time and Space," as in his "Philosophy of Reflection."

I wish only to point out what is apparently involved in Hartmann's hypothesis that the "masked" somnambulant consciousness is competent to the ideal element in all phenomena occurring in the medium's waking state. In place of a spirit-Ego beyond the organism, he duplicates the physical Ego within the organism; and that not in the sense in which du Prel, indeed, finds this duplication (or, as he calls it, "self-sundering") in the dream states, wherein the subjective activity from behind the normal threshold dramatises as objective agent merely in the dream life, but as a veritable co-existence of self-conscious personalities belonging to, and dependent on, the same physical organism. That our organic self-consciousness may be a mere conditioned limitation of a larger and truer self, in other words, that this consciousness does not exhaust the self, the individual, or that the "person" is not co-extensive with the "subject," is quite another proposition, of which Kant gave the first hint in modern philosophy, and which is du Prel's doctrine of transcendental subjectivity.

As regards the physical phenomena of mediumship, I think the opinion of most persons conversant with them will be that Hartmann's hypothesis is too complicated in itself, and even thus is inadequate to the facts. But as it is certain that some physical emanation from the medium determines the range and power of the agency, there seem to be but two alternatives to the dynamical system advocated in this pamphlet. One is the extra-organic duplication of the medium, in whole or in part, such that the phantom person or limb draws to itself the forces of the organism, which, or the corresponding member of which, is left cold and inanimate by the transfer. Thus, if the whole phantom were projected, the state of the medium at the table would be that of trance, as happens often, but by no means always, during the course of strong physical phenomena at a distance. The reunion with the organism—the "repercussion"—is instantaneous. This hypothesis (which has a great deal of authority and evidence in support of it) would show the futility of certain ingenious "exposures" of mediums by staining the so-called "spirit-hand" (or other part) with substances afterwards found on the corresponding part of the medium. For upon the rejunction, any such foreign matter would naturally be deposited on the surface of the medium's body. It is a good test to distinguish this case from the alternative one of "spirit" agency, but proves nothing necessarily against the integrity of the medium. Hartmann's remarks on the ignorance of "exposers" have an even wider application than he imagined.

The absence of any definite account of the process implied in the above supposition must be admitted; yet it is not inconceivable, and it has evidence of direct observation in its favour.‡

The other alternative is that the medium's "aura" or "atmosphere," supplies the condition within its circuit for the physical operation of the invisible agencies called spirits, which need not necessarily be human, or even with independent intelligence in the sense of rationality. The possibilities of Nature beyond the senses are infinite, and as there are mundane animals below humanity, it is an admissible conjecture that there is no grade of life without etherial representation.‡

The agency of human spirits has, I believe, been greatly exaggerated by Spiritualists, and most of the communications purporting to come from them are sufficiently explained by causes too little recognised. The current Spiritualist conception of death as a simple change of external conditions, so that there is a mere continuity of consciousness on the same level, and in the same modes, seems to me to denote great poverty of thought;

* See, however, on this point Hellenbach's "Geburt und Tod," &c. Vienna, 1883.

† Hartmann's references by no means exhaust the best authorities. The works of the American writer, Epes Sargent, should especially be consulted. See also D'Assier's "L'Humanité Posthume," (Paris, 1882) on the above point.

‡ I hope it will not be supposed that this is a suggestion of the survival of our animals as spirits, and of their agency at séances.

nor are we constrained to accept it on the evidence of facts. That true communications from deceased persons there are, I believe; but if we consider that the indrawing of consciousness to a deeper subjective degree must needs be retarded by lingering affinities—it may be of affection, or it may be of sense—which detain the spirit, all unsuited as its conditions are, in earth-life and its memories, we shall find nothing in the facts appealed to by Spiritualists inconsistent with a finer and profounder doctrine of the soul than any external phenomena can reveal. It is very significant that the most urgent to communicate are seldom those who have passed away in the fulness of time, but rather suicides, victims of fatal accident, or such as have otherwise been prematurely deprived of their organic connection with earth-life.

The author has repudiated an a priori negation of the spirit hypothesis,* and all, but especially admirers of his philosophical genius, must readily accept his disclaimer of a position which would only be appropriate to a materialist. But he certainly seems to confound, in one indiscriminate denunciation, belief in spirits and their agency with a revival of medieval superstition in its grossest forms, or rather he assumes the latter to be an inseparable result of the former. Yet it was not the belief as such, but the ignorant connotations of the belief, that led to the worst consequences in former times. The worst superstition was that which led to the persecution of the superstitious. In the nature of things there is no reason why belief in spirits should not recover its place in human culture, or why the foundations of the belief should not be cleared from mischievous misconceptions by an enlightened study and research. That certainly was the opinion of the greatest of modern philosophers. "I confess," said Kant ("Trium eines Geistessehers," &c.), "that I am much disposed to assert the existence of immaterial natures in the world, and to place my own soul in the class of these beings." Nay, more: Kant even anticipated the empirical proof of this fact, the physical condition being a partial solution of the cellular tissues encasing the subtler organism which relates us to supersensuous things and beings. And, therefore, he says in the following passage that the proof is not forthcoming, "as long as all goes well," viz., as long as the physical integrity in which health consists is unimpaired, whereas it can almost always be shown that mediums and somnambules are either persons in whom some constitutional lesion has taken place, or in whom there is some failure of equilibrium in the organic forces. "It will hereafter, I know not where or when, yet be proved that the human soul stands even in this life in indissoluble association with all immaterial natures of the spirit world, that it reciprocally acts on these and receives impressions from these, of which as man it is not conscious, as long as all goes well." (Id.) The fact is that, as the German proverb runs, "the child has been shaken out with the bath." The old popular and theological belief in spirits was encrusted with conceptions from which intelligence has been progressively breaking loose for the last two centuries. Modern rationalism has not analysed or discriminated. Facts of nature, clothed upon by ignorance and religious superstition,† have been treated as equally subjective with their investiture. Or rather, this having once happened, we have now to rediscover, in an experience very perplexing to our sophisticated intelligence, that there really is a nature beneath the surface with which our senses connect us. A late American writer‡ has suggested, with considerable probability, that the wholesale destruction, by fanaticism, of the mediums and somnambules, called witches in former generations, almost exterminated the germs of the abnormal natures which bring sub-surface facts to observation. Ignorant persecution has thus, perhaps, reinforced the materialistic tendency of modern rationalism by a long suppression of the evidence which would refute it. On the other hand, unbelief has been favourable to the slow and silent reproduction of the germ remnants, which have within the last generation produced a crop that can no longer remain unnoticed. "Mediumistic" persons are now undoubtedly multiplying in an extraordinary ratio, and it will be increasingly difficult to ignore the resulting phenomena.

It is a favourite a priori argument against the recognition of spirit agency that it is inconsistent with the progressive displacement of such agency by science. But it does not follow, because general laws have been substituted for immediate acts of will in the regular phenomena of the universe, that no acts of will remain, to which psychological laws, indeed, but only such, are applicable. Acts of will have appropriate phenomena, and we are not to ignore them because man has formerly confounded the phenomena of physical nature with the phenomena of psychical nature. If, however, the phenomena in question are subject to physiological laws, and thus explainable, by all means let us have the information from scientific research. It is all we ask. The plea is for research and study; that these methods should supersede a "conspiracy of silence" unworthy of human intellect and honesty. Let there be an end to this conventional affectation, an end to the preposterous pretence that "Spiritualism" is not a subject which men of "culture" can touch! Your "culture" may not touch it, but if not, it will very soon itself touch your "culture" at the very foundation! Of that there are already many symptoms. Meanwhile, it is no doubt the fact that such part of the uncritical populace as has addicted itself to Spiritualism has seen the agency of spirits in much that belongs to the province of ordinary psychology, or even to the common accidents of life. But these are not the representatives of the revival, but its enfants terribles. A much more educated and intelligent class, also, have perhaps erred, owing to imperfect acquaintance with the psychology of somnambulist states. But there has long been an increasing tendency to discrimination, combined with a tolerance and open-mindedness not, perhaps, to be discovered in any other movement that has appealed so profoundly to emotional interests. Dr. von Hartmann seems to have mistaken the first ebullition of the revival in Germany, where it is not ten years old, and its extravagances in America, where it was so rapidly disseminated that corrective influences are only now beginning to make themselves felt, for its true tendency. The fact that this translation was first published in the columns of the Spiritualist journal "LIGHT" perhaps sufficiently evidences the liberal disposition of Spiritualists in this country. I refer, of course, to the higher level of intelligence, according to which every school, or sect, or party should be judged. But as it is not to be denied that ignorant and unbalanced minds may take harm by contact with a subject condemned to intellectual neglect, yet offering experiences of extraordinary attraction, this consideration may well be urged in addition to that of the great scientific interests involved, upon those who can influence the directions which serious inquiry and discussion should take.

* In a letter to me which has been published in the journal "LIGHT."
† Which still makes many of the clergy, in dealing with this subject, the powerful allies of materialism.
‡ Epes Sargent.

SOME NOTES ON THE DEVELOPMENT OF A TRANCE MEDIUM.

While taking part in a private Spiritualistic circle I sometimes asked myself: Are the trance-mediums genuine in their utterances? That is, are they utterances from the spiritual world? or at least are they the unconscious and unprepared utterances and not some essay learnt off?

With some I was obliged to come to the conclusion they were genuine, since they would lecture on any subject proposed on the spur of the moment, and deliver, in most cases, a really remarkable lecture dealing with all points of the subject.

Others I did not think well of.

I decided, without informing the circle, that if I could be developed I would permit myself to be so. I am not yet able to speak, nor have I entered the unconscious trance, but the fault lies with myself since I would not permit myself to fall into unconsciousness, as I was desirous of carefully observing what would happen. It is now five months since my decision to try this experiment.

To me the development appears slow; others of more experience say it is rapid.

For a month nothing resulted. This I now understand was the result of over-anxiety on my part to induce the state.

My observations confirm the statement that mesmeric influence cannot be received (by a person who has never been mesmerised) when the will of the patient refuses to have it, or, on the other hand, is over-anxious to induce the state.

Finding nothing resulted at the end of the month, I subsided into perfect passivity. I said to myself, "If there be anything it can come; if not, I cannot help it."

At the second sitting, in the passive state, I felt a distinct magnetic current pass with wave-like motions over my body. This was preceded (and almost always was until very lately) by a feeling of a hand placed on my forehead and back of my head. This feeling was very distinct, but as the sittings are mostly in the light it was no visible operator. I make this remark because although our circle is a genuine one, yet it is necessary to give a stranger every proof that there is no fraud. The feeling of the hands was distinct. They were also described by a friend present who is clairvoyant, who sometimes saw hands only, sometimes the operator as well. The operators often change. I had observed mediums, when going under control, convulsed, as though they received shocks, also wag their heads at great speed. This I sometimes thought was "put on." I found the same thing occur with myself, and that the shocks and accompanying starts of the body I could neither help myself nor resist.

The wagging of the head I took much notice of when it started with me. I found that as the motion increased in swiftness, myriads of stars appeared and consciousness would soon depart. This, then, appears to be the easiest, but roughest, method of bringing the patient into the unconscious trance. Now I find that when there is no "wagging," and the unconscious state is approaching, a great light appears which increases in intensity as the consciousness departs.

While in the condition of "conscious trance" I have had many ideas and flow of language, which I have never given forth, because I wish it all to be done without any conscious aid on my part. Once this has resulted in my "conscious trance," and as the circumstance is singular, I will here solemnly declare that, although I was perfectly conscious (trance), the words were uttered from my organism, but without any aid from myself. When I entered the room I was strongly impressed to leave at once. I threw the feeling off. When I went into the trance state (conscious) I was still more impressed that I must leave and that the sitting should cease.

I was then rather roughly used. Suddenly I was braced up, shoulders well back, head very erect, slightly thrown back. My tongue was compressed against the neck; the back part of the inside of my throat was also forced back; all this gently but very firmly. I was powerless. My throat now felt very clear and open, and the words came clear as a bell—"Get out of here."

Now I did not speak this, neither did I have any idea what was coming, and my own feeling was one of wonder and bewilderment at the way in which it came for, I did not do it.

The reason why we were ordered out I understood afterwards. We obeyed the order. A lady had been in the room that day who was almost, if not quite, a lunatic. As a man leaves traces of his magnetism behind by means of which the dog scents him, so this unhappy lady had left traces, or parts, of her magnetism and surroundings, which would have proved baneful to a medium or sensitive who was in the "open" condition—open to receive all influences, but praying only for good and that evil might be averted. Hence the warning.

I will answer any questions you like to put.—Yours faithfully,
W. S. P.

"OUTSIDE of all churches there is massing a large and ever-enlarging body of the unchurched. Beneath the surface of Christendom, the amazing growth of Spiritualism is an ominous portent for ecclesiastics; since, whatever its rootings in fact or in fancy, it is thrusting itself up beneath the dogmatic platforms of the churches, and pushing hosts of men and women off into 'the open' of a free, simple, natural religion. The decay of ecclesiasticism is going on so fast that the careful observer need no longer watch the centuries in order to note its progress, the decades marking clearly the stages of this dissolution. Its causes are patent."—R. HEBER NEWTON, in North American Review.

A VISION AND CURE.—"Pasquier, aged sixty, ex-game-keeper," the Comte de Tarragon writes to us, "had for a considerable time gone about, by the help of sticks, suffering from painful and extensive ulcers of the legs, which the doctors failed to cure. Before going to the hospital, which he dreaded, he came to me, asking if I thought the spirits could not do him some good. I said that they often did if their aid were invoked, and I exhorted him to do so; but that if he could come to me next day, he might consult some good doctors, who were coming to my house. I saw no more of him for eight days, when I met him, without his sticks, after the service at church. He said that he told his wife of my exhortation, and that at night they prayed together that good spirits would aid him. During the night, he said, he had a dream of seeing some one in the room, who quieted his first fear by making signs of friendship. Then the stranger took some of the herbs which were in the place for medicine, and put them into the jar containing the grease which he kept for application, and signed for them to be made into an ointment, waved his hand, and disappeared. 'I told my dream,' said he, 'to my wife, when she said she had had exactly the same dream. We prepared the ointment, and kept applying it until, in eight days, my legs are quite sound and well.' He showed them to me, and I saw only the scars of large ulcers."—Le Spiritism.

A PROBLEM FOR CONJURERS.

By CARL DU PREL. (Munich.)

(Translated by V.)

"Quam multa fieri non posse, priusquam facta sint, judicantur."

II.—DEDUCTIONS AND REFLECTIONS.

The logical deductions which we must draw from the facts here narrated are partly of a physical, partly of a philosophical kind. With regard to the first, almost everything is still veiled in obscurity; one thing only is clear, that is, that these slate-writings, which are impossible according to the laws which govern our phenomenal world, must be ascribed to a transcendental origin, and these occurrences which take place in our world of sense must either be accounted for by Zöllner's theory of another variety of space, or be ascribed to the passage of matter through matter (Durchdringung der Materie).

If we first analyse these events in their separate parts we shall find:—

1. That the hypothesis of prepared slates is inadmissible, since the questions are put at the last moment, or written without the medium's knowledge, and then answered correctly.

2. The place on which the writing is found, is quite inaccessible to the hands of the medium. In some cases the double slate is securely locked, leaving only room inside for the tiny morsel of slate pencil.

3. That the writing is being actually done at the time, can be heard.

4. That the medium is not writing is to be seen.

5. The writing must be actually done with the morsel of slate or lead pencil. The scratching sound upon the slate is distinctly audible to the whole circle, and the sound always corresponds to the side of the slate written upon, and the bit of pencil used. On one occasion, when a sceptic placed a morsel of red chalk in the slate, the writing was done with the red chalk; besides which, the bit of pencil is found to be worn down after the writing is done, and its identity can be ascertained by its having previously been marked.

So much with regard to the physical point of view. With respect to the philosophical, we add the following:—

6. The writing is done by an intelligent being, since the answers are exactly pertinent to the questions.

7. This being can read, write, and understand the language of human beings, frequently such as is unknown to the medium.

8. It strongly resembles a human being, as well in the degree of its intelligence as in the mistakes sometimes made.

These beings are therefore, although invisible, of human nature, or species, as regards the intellectual side. It is no use whatever to fight against this proposition; it is not for this person or that to draw what logical conclusion he pleases from facts; and this is a very good thing, otherwise humanity would never be taught anything by means of facts.

Should we, therefore, call these beings spirits? This we are not justified in doing; since, let alone that the idea of a spirit according to Kant, as a being simply of thought, is an unjustifiable one, because he had no experience on the subject; the fact that they are invisible does not prove that they have no materiality, or form, for every scientist knows that there are combinations of matter which are imperceptible to our senses.

It is only because I do not wish to be accused of having formed too hasty an opinion, that I proceed to give further particulars which lie at the root of these experiences, without committing myself here to any further assertions, before doing which I desire to have still more experience.

9. If these beings speak, they do so in human language.

10. If they are asked who they are, they answer that they are beings who have left this world. (Verstorbene Menschen.)

11. When these beings become partly visible, perhaps only their hands, the medium sitting in a dark cabinet, the room in which are the members of the circle being only dimly lighted—when I was present two candles were burning—the hands seen are of human form. I need scarcely say that I should not advance this as evidence, had not every precaution been taken against imposture, the medium's coat being sewn down the front and the sleeves sewn together behind his back, the stitches being cut after the séance was over; and had not one of the party, while the proceedings took place, stood behind the medium in the cabinet, holding his hands.

12. When these beings become entirely visible in the dark room, in which case the medium himself sits among the chain formed by the circle, they show the human form and countenance. It is very easily said that in this case it is the medium himself who is masquerading. But when the medium speaks from his seat; when his neighbours on either side declare that they have hold of his hands, and at the same time I see a figure standing close to me; when this figure illumines his face with the air-exhausted glass tube filled with quicksilver, lying on the table—the light produced by shaking which not impeding the phenomena—so that I can see it distinctly, then the collective evidence of the facts I have narrated proves to me the necessity of the existence of a transcendental being, even if thereby all the conclusions I have come to during twenty years of work and study should be thrown overboard. Since, however, on the contrary my views (as set forth in my "Philosophy of Mysticism") have taken quite another course, and are only further justified by these experiences, I find as little subjective grounds for combating these facts as objective ones.

In the "Philosophy of Mysticism," the analysis of our so-called unconsciousness has brought me to recognise a transcendental power of perception, into the different ramifications of which I afterwards inquired. Some agent must also necessarily be at the bottom of this power, a transcendental subject. Now, from reasons, which it would be out of place here to mention, this subject must be considered as capable of development, whereby the principle of "conservation of energy" and of Darwinism in its metaphysical department is led up to. The fact is, therefore, that earthly Darwinism would not be possible, were not metaphysical Darwinism a truth.

On the other side, I now have the empirical experience of the existence of such transcendental beings, which I am convinced of by the evidence of my senses of sight, hearing, and feeling, as well as by their own intelligent communications. Under these circumstances, being led by two methods of inquiry to the self-same goal, I must indeed be abandoned of the gods if I did not recognise the fact of the immortality—or rather let us say, since the proofs do not extend farther—the continued existence of man after death.

There is forcible proof for this conclusion in the analysis of the occurrences, given in Nos. 1 and 8, by slate-writing, and I would therefore advise everyone to seek for conviction by this method. Here the whole process takes place before the eyes of the spectators in full light; the medium is almost entirely passive in the proceeding, he does not require to know the question asked, and often operates solely by his mere presence, though more powerfully when his hands touch the slates—because there is no force in nature, which is not weakened by the effect of distance; in short, the whole proceeding is so simple, that it may be likened to “looking for knots in rushes” to scent imposture here.

There are indeed sceptics who consider it a matter of suspicion that the medium should touch the slates, and that the folding slates should be locked, so that the surface of the slates is in darkness. According to this logic, the existence of the fixed stars may be denied, on account of the suspicious circumstance that they are only seen by night, which evidently points to a great American humbug. There are likewise sceptics who suggest that the medium writes with his foot, and I have no doubt that some journalists will assert that they know at a distance both of time and space what took place at a well-lighted table in Vienna, far better than I did who was sitting at that table. I am not going to address myself to such clever persons; for it is well known that the most obstinately blind are those who are determined not to see, and those who are not open to reason cannot be convinced, even by the most well-proved facts. To fight against facts with theories is, however, as though a pot of earthenware should strike one of iron in the hopes of shattering it.

On the contrary, if a person of sound and clear understanding, that is, one who has not a pre-conceived theory which he is determined to save at any cost, will attend one séance for slate-writing only, he will have to give in to the facts. I will relate an instance of this in the case of a Viennese professor. When we attempted in his presence some experiments with a photographer—which, however, led to no results—(real conjurers have no unsuccessful séances) we concluded by asking the question if we might hope for more success later in the day; in the folding slate the answer “No” was written, the sound of the writing being distinctly heard. And these two letters were quite sufficient to convince the professor.

Now, why was this so? Simply because his mind was unbiassed, and, like a finely-balanced pair of scales, was able to give the right weight to the facts that came before him. Other brains resemble rough, heavy scales, which cannot even with a cart-load of facts be brought to a just understanding of them. Considered in themselves, two letters of the alphabet seem but an insignificant fact, but they are all sufficient if the mental balance is a fine one. According to Kant and Schopenhauer, the essential function of the brain is to trace effects to causes. Now, in the case of these slate-writings, it is manifest that the cause of them cannot lie within the phenomenal world, and therefore must be of a transcendental nature. If anyone who is an eye-witness of these occurrences is not able to see this, it is a proof that the causal function of his intellect is imperfect.

The causal function of the intellect really exists in finding the reason of some apparent contradiction of the laws of nature. This faculty must evidently precede a correct capacity of judgment, and if this is present, the domain will be recognised in which the especial cause of the phenomenon must lie. This slate-writing especially imposes upon the reason the task of determining whether the cause lies within the domain of mechanical law, or is of transcendental origin. If, therefore, the cause is sought in an inverted direction, or in accordance with the a priori assumption that it cannot lie in the domain in which it really does lie, this is a proof of a defective causal function of the intellect. And if it is indeed a logical error of judgment to deduce a false cause from the right domain, the error is still greater if the cause is looked for in the wrong department. This is, however, the case when the cause of slate-writing is sought in the domain of mechanical law, which, as we have before proved, leads to a logical impossibility.

A rightly balanced intellect makes good use of the means at its command. Such a man as Kant, for example, knew very little of our solar system, compared with a modern astronomer; but those few data which he possessed were sufficient for him to reconstruct the system in his own mind. From few effects he arrived at the right cause. Another, who knew perhaps even more than our astronomers, might not arrive at a correct conclusion. Kant proceeded after the principle of making the most of the smallest indications of power, which is only done by nature and genius. On the other side there are, without doubt, doubters who after witnessing with their own eyes the phenomenon of slate-writing, still remain sceptical. They wish to believe it is only a case of greater powers of deception, since they are on the look-out for imposture; but the fact only proves that their minds are not capable of correct judgment, and that instead of becoming enlarged by this means they become still narrower. The rightly balanced intellect must, in witnessing such slate-writings, be opened to the fact, that from the impossibility of their being executed by normal means, an interference of the transcendental world with our normal world is here accomplished, which, even because the theory of development is true, draws each world little by little to one another. Not to speak of such sceptics as these, the same thing happens here as in other departments; those who have seen and observed the facts, confirm them; those who have not seen and indeed consider it beneath their dignity to examine into them, deny them. It is pretty evident on which side the truth should be found.

Those sceptics who are deficient in powers of observation may be divided into certain classes. Among the most ignorant are those who think that whatever is beyond human comprehension, particularly their own individual comprehension, is also against reason. These persons may, therefore, give an explanation of the views I have here set forth, by questioning in me the “capitis diminutio,” or, in other words, denying me the use of my senses. As, however, in the future, I do not intend by any means to restrict myself in my writings to the subject of so-called “Spiritualism,” I hope to force upon them the strange hypothesis that I am only mad on that one subject. Naturally, I shall not answer such opponents.

TRANCE AND PREMATURE BURIAL.—On Monday week the infant child of parents living at Hillside-road, Stamford Hill, N., was seized with convulsions, which resulted in apparent death. The body was prepared for burial, and on Saturday the interment took place at Abney Park Cemetery. While the coffin was being lowered a child's cry was heard, and as soon as the lowering had been completed a cry was again heard. The coffin was drawn up and the top unscrewed, when it was found that the little one was alive. The child was taken home and is now in a fair way of recovery.—Echo, October 20th.

PHASES OF MATERIALIZATION.

IN THE

OBJECTIVE PHENOMENA OF SPIRITUALISM.

It is now a common occurrence for Mr. Eglinton to be brought out from the inner room, which serves him as a cabinet, into that in which the observers are sitting while the psychic form is visible to all. I may refer to narratives recording this crucial piece of evidence which have appeared in “LIGHT,” and especially to that remarkable record published on February 28th, 1885, which, for exactness of description, as well as for the facilities for observation granted to fourteen people, is of high value as a piece of evidence: and I may quote, as eminently germane to my argument, a narrative of a very precise and remarkable character contributed by Florence Marryat.*

“I wish to call the attention of the readers of ‘LIGHT’ to an account of two séances, at which I have had the pleasure of assisting lately, given under the mediumship of Mr. William Eglinton, at 12, Old Quebec-street, W. The first séance took place on Friday evening, September 5th, on which occasion the circle consisted of Mr. and Mrs. Stuart, Colonel and Mrs. Wynon, Mr. and Mrs. R. H. Russell-Davies, Colonel and Mrs. Lean, Mr. C., and Mr. Morgan. We sat in the front drawing-room in a semi-circle, with one gas-burner alight; and the doors having been properly secured against any intrusion, Mr. Eglinton took up a position in the back drawing-room, which is divided by a pair of curtains from the front. He had not left us a couple of minutes before a man stepped out from the portière and walked into the midst of us. He was a large, stout man, and very dark, and most of the sitters noticed that he had a very peculiar smell. No one recognised him, and after appearing two or three times he left, and was immediately succeeded by a woman, not unlike him in appearance, who was also unrecognised by any present. These two spirits, before retiring, came out together, and seemed to examine the circle curiously.

“After a short interval, a much smaller and slighter man came forward, and darted in a peculiar slouching attitude round the circle. He had also a dark face, but with very refined and handsome features. Colonel Lean asked him to shake hands. He replied by seizing his hand, and nearly pulling him off his seat on to the floor. He then darted across the room, and gave a similar proof of his muscular power to Mrs. Stuart. But when I asked him to notice me, he took my hand and squeezed it firmly between both his own. Colonel Lean asked him if he could disappear through the floor. He responded by mounting through the ceiling. His figure elongated until the head reached the ceiling, at which time the drapery touched the floor, and then he ascended, little by little, till all that was left of him was a piece of drapery no larger than a pocket handkerchief, which he flapped for a minute or so before he drew it after him. He had scarcely disappeared before Abdulah, with his one arm, and his six feet of height, stood before us, and salaamed all round. Then came my daughter Florence, a girl of nineteen years old, very slight and feminine in appearance. She advanced once or twice, near enough to touch me with her hand, but seemingly fearful to venture farther, retreated again. But the next moment she re-appeared, dragging Mr. Eglinton after her. He was in deep trance, breathing with difficulty, but Florence held him by the hand and brought him up to my side, when he detached my hands from those of the sitters either side of me, and making me stand up, took my daughter and placed her in my arms. As I stood enfolded in her embrace, she whispered a few words to me relative to a subject known to no one but myself, and she placed both my hands upon her heart and bosom that I might feel she was a living woman. Colonel Lean asked her to go to him. She tried and failed, but after having retired for a minute behind the curtain to gather strength, she appeared again with Mr. Eglinton, and, calling Colonel Lean to her, embraced him. This is one of the most perfect instances on record of a medium being distinctly seen by ten witnesses with the spirit, under gas. The next materialization that appeared was for Mr. Stuart. This gentleman is newly arrived from Australia, and a stranger to

Mr. Eglinton. As soon as he saw the lady who called him to the portière to speak to her, her exclamation of genuine surprise and conviction, mingled with awe, was unmistakable. He said, ‘My God! Pauline.’ The spirit then whispered to him, and putting her arms round his neck, affectionately kissed him. He turned after a while and addressed his wife, telling her that the spirit bore the very features and expression of their niece, Pauline, whom they had lost the year before. Mrs. Stuart asked if she also might not advance, and look at the spirit, but it was intimated she must wait for the next time, as all the power had been exhausted in producing an exact materialization, so perfectly recognisable on the first occasion of its return to earth. Mr. Stuart expressed himself as entirely satisfied of the identity of his niece, and said she looked just as she did before she was taken ill. I must not omit to say that the medium also appeared with this figure, making the third time of showing himself in one evening with the spirit-form. The next appearance was of a little child, apparently about two years old, who supported itself in walking by clinging to a chair. The attention of the circle was diverted from this sight by seeing Abdulah, six feet high, dart from behind the curtains at the same moment, and stand with the child in our view, whilst Mr. Eglinton appeared between the two forms, making a ‘trisa juncta in uno.’ Thus ended the first of the séances I wish to bring before your notice. The second took place on Saturday, September 27th, and under very similar circumstances. The circle this time consisted of Mrs. Wheeler, Mr. Woods, Miss S., Mrs. P., Mrs. Victor Stevens, Mr. Frank Marryat, Colonel and Mrs. Lean, Mr. Morgan, and the Hon. G. S., and we sat in the same order as before, and under the same conditions. Mr. Eglinton appeared on this evening to find some difficulty in passing under control, and he came out into the circle so many times to gather magnetism, that I guessed we were about to enjoy some unusually good manifestations. The voice of Joey, too, requested us, under no circumstances whatever, to loose hands, as they were going to try something very difficult, and we might defeat their efforts at the very moment of victory. When the medium was at last under control in the back drawing-room, a tall man with an uncovered head of dark hair, and a large beard, appeared and walked up to Mrs. P. She was very much affected by the recognition of the spirit, who was her brother. She called him by name, and kissed him, and informed us that his face was just as it had been in earth-life. Her emotion was so great, we were afraid she would faint, but after a while she became calm again. Then a lady came forward, the mother of Miss S., and gave her some advice relative to her private affairs. We next heard the notes of a clarinet. I was aware that Mr. Woods (also a stranger, until a few days since, to Mr. Eglinton) had lost a brother under peculiar circumstances (all of which had been detailed satisfactorily to him by slate-writing through Mr. Eglinton), and that he had been promised and expected to see his brother this evening. It was the first time, however, that I had ever seen Mr. Woods, and yet (so remarkable was the likeness between the brothers) that when a spirit now appeared with a clarinet in its hand, I could not help knowing at once who it was, and saying so to my next neighbour. The spirit advanced to Mr. Woods and grasped his hand. As they appeared thus, with their profiles turned to one another, they were strikingly similar in feature and expression. This spirit's head was also bare—an uncommon occurrence—and covered with thick hair. He appeared twice, and said distinctly, ‘God bless you,’ more than once. Mrs. Wheeler, who had only seen the spirit once in earth-life, was startled by the tone of the voice, which she recognised at once, and Mr. Morgan, who intimately knew the deceased gentleman in Australia, confirmed the recognition by saying it was a perfect likeness of the spirit. My daughter Florence then came out, but only a little way, not far enough to reach us. I was disappointed at her want of boldness, which Joey explained by saying she was weak to-night as they wanted to reserve the strength for a manifestation by-and-by. He then said, ‘Here comes a Masonic friend for Mr. S.,’ and a man wearing the Masonic badge and scarf appeared, and made the tour of the circle, giving the Masonic grip to the Freemasons present. He was a very good-looking young man, and said he had met some of those present in Australia, but no one seemed to recognise him. He was succeeded by the same male spirit who ascended through the ceiling on the 5th September. As he appeared through the curtains, a female form, bearing a very bright light, appeared with him as if to show the way. She did not come beyond the portière, but everyone in the room saw her distinctly. On account of the dress and complexion of the male figure, we had wrongly called him 'the Bedouin.' Mr. Frank Marryat now discovered he was an East Indian by addressing him in Hindustani, to which he responded in a low voice. Someone asked him to take a seat amongst us, upon which he seized a heavy chair in one hand and flourished it above his head. He then squatted, native fashion, on the ground, and left us, as before, by ascending through the ceiling. Joey now announced that they were going to try the experiment of showing us how the spirits were made from the medium. This was the crowning triumph of the evening. Mr. Eglinton appeared in the very midst of us, in trance. He came into the room backwards, and as if fighting with the power, his eyes shut, and his breath drawn with labour. As he stood thus, holding a chair for support, a white, flimsy mass was seen on his hip, his legs became illuminated with lights travelling up and down them, and a white cloud settled about his head and shoulders.

"The mass increased, and he breathed harder and harder, whilst invisible hands pulled the flimsy drapery out of his hip in long strips that amalgamated as soon as formed, and the cloud grew thicker. All at once, in a moment, as we eagerly watched the process, the spirit, full formed, stood beside him. No one saw it had been raised in the midst of us, but it was there. Mr. Eglinton then retired with his new-born spirit behind the portiere, but in another moment he came, or was thrown out, amongst us again, and fell upon the floor. The curtains opened, and the figure of Ernest appeared, and raised the medium by the hand. As he saw him, Mr. Eglinton fell on his knees, and Ernest drew him out of sight.

"This ended what I am sure your readers will agree with me in calling a most marvellous séance."

We, the undersigned, were present at one or both of the séances described, and we give our testimonies that the description of them is perfectly accurate, and that they were performed under test conditions, the doors being locked and the key in the possession of one of the company:—Francis Lean, Lieutenant-Colonel, 20, Regent's Park-terrace, N.W.; R. H. Russell-Davies, 12, Westbourne Park-road, N.W.; R. Stuart, 24, Ebury-street, S.W.; Alexander Wynne, Lieutenant-Colonel, United Service Club, Pall Mall, S.W.; Eva Florence Stevens, 20, Minora-street, Fulham, S.W.; Frank Marryat, 20, Regent's Park-terrace, N.W.; W. (To be continued.)

STONE THROWING.—The San Francisco Chronicle reports manifestations of a strange, intelligent power in Shasta County, by which a family, in which were children from four to fifteen, has been driven from its home. The manifestations were movements of heavy objects, stone throwing, &c., by unseen agents. Similar manifestations occurred in San José some time ago, by which a family was driven from one home to another, and then another, when they suddenly ceased. In this latter case, some of the stones thrown into the house weighed two or three pounds, and were very numerous. Doors and walls were badly battered, and windows broken, but no living person was hurt, even when struck. Stones which had been thrown through the doorway were seen sometimes to rise spirally and strike the ceiling. A sceptical gentleman who came "to find out how it was done," chose a seat from which to make observations, but was driven to change it by a half-pound stone striking the wall behind him, missing his head by a "close shave."—Golden Gate.

THOUGHT-READERS.—A writer in a late number of Le Messenger refers to the instances of thought-reading communicated by Mr. H. S. Thompson to the Psychical Research Society. They presented themselves in a little girl who had an affection of the eyes consequent upon a fever. In the course of his mesmeric treatment, he found that she perceived his thoughts. One day, at the previously expressed wish of an investigating friend, he silently willed her to bring to him from a vase of flowers in the room a particular sprig, and she did so as promptly as if he had uttered his request in words. The writer in Le Messenger regards the thought-reading faculty as a natural gift capable of further development by use—a kind of mediumship. Thought-readers say, like mediums, that the exercise of their faculty is followed by a sense of nervous exhaustion; for success in the exercise of it they also ask for passive or neutral subjects to act with them in their demonstrations, such as have not made up their minds adversely as to the existence of the faculty.

THE SPIRITUAL OUTLOOK.

XLI.

[We shall esteem it a favour on the part of our readers if they will forward us, for use in this column, any allusions to Spiritualism and Psychical Research they may come across in the course of their reading. We see a great many of these ourselves, but it is obvious that there must be many references to the subject which do not meet our eyes.—ED. OF "LIGHT."]

Thomas R. Hazard, a well-known Spiritualist, of Rhode Island, U.S.A., is giving an autobiographical account of his observations of Spiritualism for thirty years in one of the oldest American journals, the Philadelphia North American. His experiences began in 1839, and have continued ever since. These letters, so widely circulated through the newspaper Press by the American habit of copying every matter of interest into thousands of journals, will make one of the most interesting books ever published.

There are now living in the world scores—hundreds—of men and women, whose observations may be nearly as extensive and remarkable as those of Mr. Hazard, and the time is not distant when some competent writer will bring together, arrange, and publish an Encyclopædia of Spiritualism which will convince the most incredulous of the reality of the Spiritual phenomena.

Such a book, I need not say, will have more real interest and value than many books now existing on this planet. Psychology is the highest, the deepest, and by far the most important of sciences. Astronomy, geology, and biology lead up to this science of sciences—the nature, powers, and destiny of the human soul. Our one guide to that knowledge of ourselves centres in the phenomena of Spiritualism.

The true dignity of man consists in the fact of his immortality. The life which could be ended—the existence which could be terminated by a pistol-shot, a drop of prussic acid—by a thousand accidents, would be hardly worth caring for. "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die"—let us have our fill of sensual delights—are quite natural conclusions to those who do not believe in a continued and progressive existence. If life is to end, and may end by the accident of any hour, why not end it whenever it becomes disagreeable?

The Christian Commonwealth is flying signals of distress. "The faith-cure and the mind-cure," it says, "are both alike the offspring of fanaticism and superstition. The ministers of Boston know not what to do in presence of this new craze, which is robbing them of their congregations wholesale. We regard this new development of fanaticism with considerable alarm. Its results are only too likely to be evil and disastrous. Scepticism is born of superstition. The human reason, held in bondage by darkness and authority, revolts, and rebounds to the furthest point in the opposite direction." Just so. Then why try any longer to hold human reason in such miserable bondage?

In 1692, twenty persons were put to death in one county in Connecticut—tried by torture and convicted of witchcraft. In New England 200 persons were condemned for this now obsolete crime, and down to about a century ago hundreds were similarly convicted and executed. A woman and her daughter, aged thirteen, were hanged on the same gallows at Oxford. It is just about a century since the last witch was executed in Scotland. In late years mediums have been denounced in pulpits and newspapers, and a few imprisoned—but the era of stake and gibbet is happily passed away.

It is really much better when you think of it. Mr. Eglinton can give a slate-writing séance to a Royal Highness or to a more powerful Prime Minister without peril. To think how different it was less than two centuries ago! Here is a sample: "Abigail Faulkner, daughter of the Rev. Francis Dane, of Andover, was condemned to death, her two daughters, only eight and ten years of age, testifying that their mother had made witches of them, they having signed their names to the devil's book with pen dipped in their own blood. She was tortured to make her confess, but died without confessing. Giles Corey, an old man eighty-one years of age, was accused and tried. Refusing to confess, the court ordered him to be put to the torture. They laid him prostrate and piled heavy weights upon him to break his stubborn will. He called upon them to 'pile on more weight! more weight!' till he died." And this was done under the influence of Christians like Governor Endicott and the Rev. Cotton Mather, and so wise a judge as Sir Matthew Hale.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[It is preferable that correspondents should append their names and addresses to communications. In any case, however, these must be supplied to the Editor as a guarantee of good faith.]

The London Spiritualist Alliance. To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—The London Spiritualist Alliance has now held a considerable number of soirées at St. James's Hall, admission to which has been freely accorded to friends of members, and to those who have sought introduction. The number of persons who, by their presence, may be presumed to have an interest in our work, is very considerable. These soirées are a very large item in our expenditure, and we are not disposed to grudge the outlay which they have involved.

But we are of opinion that those whose interest in our proceedings is sufficiently active to lead them to desire to attend our meetings so regularly may fairly be invited to qualify themselves for future attendance by becoming members of the Alliance. The expense incurred is so trivial that it is within the reach of all but a very small minority.

It should be borne in mind that our resources are limited, and that the work before us is vast. We want funds, and we can utilise any amount of money that is likely to be entrusted to us. Our operations are curtailed by want of the means that ought, we think, to be at our disposal, in view of the general interest in our work.

We do not propose, therefore, to issue indiscriminately, as we have done, invitations to our meetings. We are desirous that any one who is interested in our work should have opportunity of attending one or more of our meetings, and any member will at once be furnished with a ticket for the admission of such an inquirer on application to myself or to the Hon. Sec. But we trust that those whose continued interest in our work is manifested by a flattering attendance on our proceedings will go a step further, and support us by adding their names to our list of members.

I hope I may be pardoned if I ask that the quid pro quo may not be too rigidly insisted on. Instead of the oft-repeated question, "What am I to get out of membership in the L.S.A.?"—a query which, if it were of universal application, would paralyse all effort except that which was expected to be of merely selfish application—I would hope that we might rather ask ourselves, "How can I best within my power subserve what I recognise to be a good and useful work?" The subscription to the L.S.A. has been placed at so low a rate as to bring it within the reach of all. May I suggest to those members to whom a guinea more or less is a small matter that they may render us a real service by distinguishing between the minimum subscription, and the larger sum which generosity may dictate?

I may add for the information of your readers that I shall have the honour to submit at our next meeting some very interesting facts relating to the state of Spiritualism in various countries, together with a plan of home work which I hope may be the commencement of a period of activity within the Alliance in the way of practical research and investigation, as well as of the development of the rarer phenomena in carefully organised circles.

Any friends, not members of the Alliance, will secure admission by signifying their wish to me or to the Hon. Sec.—I am, Sir, faithfully yours,

W. STANTON MOSES, M.A.,

President of the London Spiritualist Alliance.

Corrections.

SIR,—My preface to the translation of Hartmann's "Spiritism," as published in the supplement to "LIGHT," contains two passages which I have altered for the reprint, and I should like the alterations to appear also in "LIGHT," as they concern a material point for discussion. Speaking of Kant's striking prediction of the proof of a world of spirits, I, too, positively stated the physical condition of such proof to be "a partial solution of the cellular tissues encasing the subtler organism which relates us to supersensuous things and beings." As altered the passage will stand: "The physical condition being, perhaps, a partial solution of the cellular organism masking one for subtler impressions."

A little lower down I say—"whereas it can almost always be shown that mediums and somnambules are either persons in whom some constitutional lesion has taken place, or in whom there is some failure of equilibrium in the organic forces." Please to read instead: "Whereas it seems probable that in the abnormal persons called mediums and somnambules some constitutional lesion has been either inherited or incurred, or there is some disturbance of nervous equilibrium."

In my letter on "Facts and Theories," towards the close of second paragraph, for "psychical presence" read "physical presence."

"The Human Characteristics of Communicating Spirits."

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—A touch of common, everyday life in Spiritual communion is sometimes more telling, and sends a straighter home-thrust as to the humanity of the agency employed, than the most startling phenomena can do.

Therefore, after the very learned disquisition on this much vexed question that you have had the large-mindedness to publish in your journal, perhaps your readers may not be displeased with a few lines of extreme simplicity that will speak for themselves on this same subject.

Allow me, then, to say that on one occasion I was sitting with a dear friend (a private lady and constant companion of my séances) at a table placed before one of the three large windows of my apartment, on a summer's afternoon, so there was light in abundance.

I was correcting for publication a spiritual article purporting to be given me by a spirit sister long deceased, and I came to a passage I did not quite understand in its then written state; so I asked my friend what she considered my sister's real meaning was, when my sister herself (the voice heard by us hundreds of times being unmistakable) answered me, correcting the passage in as distinct tones as I could myself have used!

I thanked her warmly and said, "Then you really did give me this communication, dear sister?" "Yes," answered my sister, "but not the mistakes!" which made my friend and myself laugh heartily.

On another occasion my friend and I were again sitting together in my apartment, and had put out the lights to give easier conditions to our spirit friends to speak with us.

Being much absorbed by their conversation, we had forgotten the time necessary for my friend's return by train, when my spirit sister said to my friend, "Dorcas, look at the clock." My friend instantly tried to light a match to do so, but failed, when my spirit sister in a very amused tone of voice said, "Why, you've got the wrong end of the match." This my friend found was true, and on lighting the match and looking at the clock, saw she must instantly leave to catch the train.

I could multiply these home touches almost indefinitely, but must not encroach on your kindness. They will, however, suffice to show I have reason for saying in the letter you were good enough to publish from me in "LIGHT," that the spiritual beings who communicate with us—so far as my experience goes, at all events—are just men, women, and children like ourselves.—Faithfully yours,

October 26th, 1883.

SPIRITUALISM in England, endorsed as it is by those eminent English scientists, Professors Crookes and Wallace, has a standing that it has not reached in this country. But it is gaining ground here in a marvellous manner.—Golden Gate, U.S.A.

RESTITUTION THROUGH A SPIRIT.—At the beginning of the civil war, two young men of Milan, Ohio, being about to join the army, called upon a young lady friend to say farewell. While talking, one asked for a glass of water. She left the room and procured it. After they left she missed a bracelet. One of the young men fell in the war. The young lady married. Long after the incident of the bracelet, which had faded from her mind, she awoke one night to see before her the young friend who fell in the war. "I have come," he seemed to say, "to speak about the bracelet. It was I who took it. I have always regretted it. My sister has it; I handed it to her at once when I went home. If you ask her for it, at my request, she will restore it." He disappeared. Next day she went to the sister, told her the story, and she gladly handed it to her.—The Daily Local, Sandusky, Ohio.

PSEUDO SYBILS.

One of the many perplexities of Modern Spiritualism is its tendency, in certain stages, to develop Pseudo Sybils. Given a certain amount—usually limited—of mediumistic experience; an absence of all study of, or respect for, the experience of others; a defective imagination, and an infinite faculty for generating phantasy in lieu of it, coupled with an adequate amount of vanity and exaggerated self-esteem and the Pseudo Sybil steps forth, armed at all points, for the confusion of society. It is not needful that she should be consciously an impostor. It may be admitted that, occasionally, like the Pseudo Sybils encountered on the blasted heath by the Thane of Glamis, she gives us "earnest" commencing "with a truth"; but this is not often, and when she has this modicum of what is useful to impart to us, it is so smothered in superincumbent egotism and self-delusion as to be scarcely identifiable for what it really is. Nevertheless, the consciousness of this possibility inspires the more experienced Spiritualist with a certain tenderness in dealing with the Pseudo Sybil; and this feeling of forbearance is encouraged by the conviction that explanation or argument would be addressed to her in vain. She is, therefore, usually left to work out for herself her own phantasies, a lengthy process, and sooner or later painful, but probably the only possible method of illuminating a nature which, even where admittedly honest, is so absolutely irrational, so insanely self-absorbed.

But, unfortunately, there is another class of zealot entitled to be considered in this relation, viz., those upon whom from indiscriminating enthusiasm on their part, from ignorance of spiritual laws, or a mere wondering love of novelty, the Pseudo Sybil imposes, usually, it may be hoped, innocently, being herself imposed upon, and sometimes, it may be feared, the reverse. It is for the protection of such persons that we are now led to speak.

The Pseudo Sybil, full-blown—for she passes through various stages before arriving at the butterfly—is usually not young. If of a comely and dignified presence, so much the better for her self-imposed mission. She dresses well, when her fortunes admit of it, and affects, but not too austere, a quasi-sibylline style of costume. "How do you get on with her?" inquired once the friend of a young invalid under the tendance of one of this sisterhood. "Not very well in the nursing way," was the answer, "but I find the costume very supporting."

The Pseudo Sybil possesses usually a small independence but she condescends freely to accept the gifts of the faithful "for her charities." These investments will be repaid with interest in Heaven! Like Miss Flite, in Dickens' romance, she will confer estates at the Day of Judgment! Also dignities! The latter she sometimes confers on herself, even here. She is invariably mysterious; partly because mystery inspires veneration in foolish people, and partly because she has not really anything to reveal. She drapes herself, therefore, in phrases and phylacteries, surrounded ever with a halo of phantasy. She is not unalive to the practical wisdom of the philosopher who advises us not to prophesy unless we know. Nevertheless, when she has recourse to her spirits, whom she always describes with the definite article and in the singular number, they sometimes lead her into difficulties. These she surmounts, entirely to her own satisfaction, by disregarding them. Though accustomed to have recourse to the spirits on emergencies, she is careful always to disavow being a Spiritualist, and, in any real sense of the word, her disavowal must be accepted as true. In order to maintain in the eyes of the exoteric world the aspect of reserve and seclusion proper to the dignity of her claims, she frequently entertains "a dame de compagnie," lay sister, or lady-in-waiting, who interposes between her and the vulgar, and adumbrates her to the outer world. This office is usually held by a disciple, who may possess property, and certainly possesses faith, as she understands it, not unaccompanied, perhaps, at seasons by misgivings, which she dismisses as sinful.

The Pseudo Sybil is much given to symbols and similitudes, "finding sermons,"—always about herself,—in stones, and self-adulation "in everything." She is partial to "good society" in this outer sphere, when she can attain thereunto, feeling it to be a natural outcome and symbolical representation of her own rank in the Courts of Heaven; and in "those whom Providence hath blessed with affluence" she takes ever a tender interest, inspired, we will hope, by compassion for and desire to alleviate the special worldly trials and temptations to which it exposes them. Where the activities of the useful and benevolent work of the age are most alive we may scarcely hope to find the Pseudo Sybil; she belongs, she would say, to the centre and not to the circumference, and her "mission" she would claim to be to inspire and shed a Divine lustre on work rather than to do it. Indeed, "not to do it" is very generally the essential aim of her ministrations; because there lies at the root of them,—in so far as they can, by a form of speech, be said to have any root,—no spirit of useful work whatever. She, however, clothes herself in a superficial form or simulacrum of good works; and it is agreeable to her and in some sort needful to her "mission," to play "Lady Bountiful," in the comedy of her life. She does it very fairly well to indiscriminating observers, being frequently endowed with considerable histrionic powers. These are favoured by her often being enabled to possess herself with the persuasion that she is really the personage she enacts. As, for example, the lady whose work was reviewed in "LIGHT," October 17th, who claims to have been born without a father and to be in fact no other than the Woman in the Sun in the vision of the Apocalyptic seer; and another lady whom we must class with the same sisterhood, whom it was found impossible by any arguments or explanations to convince that the Franco-German War of 1870 had not been stayed solely by her prayers; or another who passed into the other life in the full conviction, which nothing could disturb, that she was never to die. These aberrations are very pitiful, but it is needful that they be firmly and even sternly repressed, as a class. The Pseudo Sybil is to be individually treated with tenderness and compassion. The ways of self-delusion are so varied and the weaknesses of human nature so manifold, that it is needless, and would be often unjust to attribute her extravagances to conscious imposture and the deliberate desire to deceive. But, as we have said, she requires to be steadfastly and earnestly withstood, lest she delude others as well as herself; and this, and not the smallest desire to give personal pain is the serious object of these remarks upon her and her doings.

ANTIQUATED TYRANNICAL LAWS.

An antiquated and rapidly-expiring form of Christian theology may fairly be credited with our present coercive and almost effete laws in relation to Sabbath observance, necromancy, &c.

The one ancient blot on our statute books with which we are more particularly concerned is that which, under the guise of Palmistry, lends itself to the suppression of the occult phenomena which are exhibited in what are termed Spiritual Séances; and the remarkable fact is that its use is not urged by dogmatic theologians, but by more dogmatic scientists, who fancy in their ignorance that they have sounded the infinite depths of natural laws, and have ascertained what can, and what cannot, by legitimate natural means, be accomplished.

The question for solution is, Do or do not the phenomena occur? and however antecedently improbable their occurrence may appear, it is the duty of all to investigate their genuineness or non-genuineness. The theory by which they are accounted for is quite another matter, and will vary with the intellectual standpoints of the investigators, but the facts are patent to all who fully investigate.

Prejudice, however, is doing its perfect work. Magistrates refuse to accept the testimonies of the most credible and well known witnesses, and assuming an exhaustive knowledge of the laws of nature, affirm that except by trick the alleged phenomena are impossible, and, evidence or no evidence to the contrary, the psychic prisoner charged with a pretension to the possession of occult powers is condemned.

Psychics conscious of their innocence are naturally not disposed to face the ordeal of a prejudiced judge, a partial bar, or an inexperienced jury, by whom supposed criminatory evidence is greedily accepted, and genuine evidence is rejected.

Within the range of our own experience we know powerful private psychics in whose presence, and under the most crucial conditions, all the higher phenomena of Modern Spiritualism have occurred. To the séances of these psychics acceptable visitors were freely admitted, and hundreds have become convinced of the reality of the phenomena through their mediumship.

Now, however, that scientific men have resolved to crush the occult powers by resorting to antiquated laws, and magistrates on the bench have affirmed that no amount of evidence would convince them of their genuineness, these powerful psychics either decline to sit for the development of the phenomena, or sit only with their families, domestics, and intimate personal friends.

This legal terrorism, exercised over the sensitive and the innocent, has rendered admission to manifestations of occult power almost impossible, and the phenomena that a few years ago were placed before any earnest inquirers, are now to be seen only in the privacy of domestic life.

Possibly the public mind is not yet ripe for the abolition of these absurd and old-world laws, but the coming elections would afford many opportunities for educating the public, if liberal and catholic-minded men would catechise Parliamentary candidates, and thus ventilate more liberal views on this vexed question.

Our readers would do well to suggest a series of appropriate questions to be publicly asked of candidates for Parliamentary honours during the coming elections. Possibly "C. C. M." would furnish us with a list of suitable questions.

The Social Strife is the title of an Independent paper, published at Muskegon, of which the 43rd number has been forwarded to us. It contains a liberal selection from Spiritualist papers.

BARON HELLENBACH.—Psychische Studien for October, states that Baron Hellenbach has merely removed from Vienna for an indefinite time on private affairs. It adds: "Mr. Eglinton has, up to date, published no explanation in 'LIGHT' of this case from his point of view (von seinem Standpunkt)."

[In this column will be given from time to time such accounts of psychical phenomena as seem to be worthy of permanent record. CLASS N.—THE SPIRIT VOICE.

[There is the audible spirit-voice, of which the "cry of the Banshee," the voices of dying persons heard at a distance, the voice heard by the Roman sailors "Great Pan is dead," and the voices heard at séances, so far as the organs of the medium are not used, might be taken as examples; and there is the inaudible spirit-voice. The latter is doubtless the "still small voice" of the Bible, well-known and cultivated in the schools of the prophets, but to their modern representatives "foolishness." It is the Dæmon of Socrates, and the other interlocutor in the internal colloquies of Luther, Bunyan, and many others. It is inaudible and yet a voice, a thought-voice, sudden, without previous links of thought, resembling in this, yet in other respects not like, a sudden thought. It may be occasionally in the faintest degree audible, always within the cranium, to the degree that singing in the ears is. It is then as if that peculiar sound had been differentiated into words, like a falling stream of quick-silver breaking into different sized globules. It may seem sometimes to come from spirit within and sometimes from spirit without. And the same is probably true of the audible voice that it may be in this sense either subjective or objective. The following is an interesting account of this phenomenon as it occurs in the experience of one of our correspondents. We beg for other accounts from those who are fortunate enough to possess this neglected bud of the undeveloped future. We should like them to give us a complete natural history of it in their cases: how it began what it says, its dependent variations, its decline, if it has come to that. And if any of our readers hear or otherwise perceive voices audible or inaudible, which seem to say words without meaning, inexplicable, like the fragments of a half-heard desultory conversation, we should like to know about these also, and if there may be detected, as we suspect, in such a phenomenon any signs of an undeveloped faculty of clairaudience.]

September 8th.

My dreams are generally allegorical. There is one feature sometimes presents itself, viz., a voice loud and distinct which sometimes gives advice to me.

October 3rd.

The voice: I hear this when sound asleep. It is quite loud, almost a shout. On the other hand, I have in my dreams heard the voice of my wife (she is alive) when I have not seen her, and sometimes I have seen her after hearing her speak. She has not (actually) spoken to me, nor does she speak in her sleep. So there is another puzzle.

I have "felt" the same, or a voice in the daytime, especially when I am trying "by impression" to find the locality where a person may be whom I wish to see. This I am mostly successful in finding, when the person is one whom I see much of. I remain as still as I can, and the name of the place or street where I shall meet him will suddenly shoot into my mind. In the same way I can feel one coming to see me. This can never be done after drinking any intoxicating liquor, and not at all successfully after smoking. Bear in mind I am simply giving my experience. I have had no guidance from friends; I wish I could have. I have stopped telling anyone, since they appear to think that one who has such ideas and impressions must be getting fit for a lunatic asylum. So all my researches are made under difficulties.

October 9th.

The voice in the daytime is quite silent. You might call it a voice impression. There are several such voices. The difficulty is to decide which is the "true" voice. In most cases I can decide. If I cannot decide, then I do not follow it. When I have followed it, it has been right. I had a curious experience of this in several instances. I was once going home to dinner, when I suddenly heard it, or "received it," telling me to go to a certain restaurant instead. I proceeded homeward, but it got so importunate I said "Well, I will see what comes." When half through my dinner a foreigner, whom I had not seen for two years, and certainly did not expect to see, came up to me, and after some conversation gave me a very good order. I could give you other instances. I never ask for such things, because it is against the express teachings of spiritual intercourse to desire business communications; we are assured that where it is necessary it will be given spontaneously. This I have always found to be the case. This I take as the working of Providence through the spirit-world.

Only last week I twice disregarded the voice, warning me not to go down a certain street or I should meet some one I did not wish to see. Although it was highly improbable, yet it happened so. I had distinguished it as what I term the "true voice" (the voice of my spirit guide, I expect), yet it was so improbable that I could not credit it, and taking any other direction would have given me 500 yards more to walk. Hence I went on. Well, it only proves it true, wherever it comes from. It seems to be the same voice as "conscience." Indeed, personally, I think it is, for conscience I look upon as the expression of the guardian angels admonishing you.

CLASS R.—A DIVINE DREAM.

As glorious to this night, being o'er my head,
As is a winged messenger of heaven,
When he doth herald the long-petted clouds,
And sails upon the bosom of the air."

[This is one of those dreams which, whether born of the emotions, or of a fine rare unconscious faculty, or of the impression of the spirits, leave behind the feeling that something mysterious and divine has occurred, that another world has touched us.]

I had been much disappointed in my investigation of Spiritualism, that although I had had incontrovertible evidence of my own departed friends, yet the mediums always avoided me or rather never had any information to give me respecting my peculiar adaptability for any phase, nor any information respecting my physical or spiritual guides. This preliminary is necessary to explain my dream. If you will have them I shall give you all attendant circumstances so that you can better account for them. I must also premise that I have taken up Spiritualism from a purely religious standpoint, it being the only system which has given me thorough satisfaction. My nature is very religious, I mean as regards faith in my Creator, and when in any difficulty or perplexity it is my custom to lay the matter before Him; hence, in this case, not hearing anything of my "guides," I desired that one might be shown me in a dream. Nothing occurred for three nights, nor had I any preconceived notion of what any of my guides were like. I thought perfect passivity would be the best.

I had been awakened up four times by my child, and on sleeping again I thought I was in the air upon clouds, when suddenly I fell upon my face, and a most brilliant light, like a number of first-rate electric lights, met my sight, so that I could not raise my head, the light being so powerful that it hurt my eyes even when closed. This light gradually subsided until I felt I could raise my head, when I saw a white rock, and from under the rock the rays of light projected outward; upon the rock was the most beautiful female I have ever seen or could ever imagine. She was draped in white, had long golden hair, which hung in masses down to her feet. She did not speak, but looked at me with a smile, and giving me one hand, which I kissed reverently, she pointed upward with the other. The light then increased until it was unbearable; and she vanished. I suddenly found myself in a church, where upon the windows was written "Faith." I thought a number of people were offering me the direction of this church and congregation; but I pointed to the windows, and said: "Not faith, but works; love to the neighbour." Whereupon they declined to have anything to do with me. That is the end of that dream, which I dreamt between 4 and 5 a.m.

SPIRITISM VERSUS OTHER THEORIES.

By THE HON. ROSEN NOEL.

Will it be attempted to assimilate these phenomena to the subjective "hallucinations" of madmen, delirious patients, dreamers, and the "delusions" of sensitives induced by mesmerism? I wish some competent person would take in hand this matter of "hallucinations," not from the physiological point of view, as has been done very ably by Mr. E. Gurney (in Mind), but from the philosophical. Personally I incline to think that hallucinations, and dreams are the effect of an exclusive, particular experience involving spiritual action from without upon the individual; as the subjective impressions, or hallucinations of the hypnotised sensitive are. And the Psychical Research Committee find that telepathic influence from the minds of others very readily affects a dreamer, which notably confirms my view of what dreams are.—But we need not discuss that now. For the very differentia of "hallucinations" and dreams is that they are subjective for me, not objective for all; that the forms seen and touched, the conversations held, are peculiar to the hallucinated, or dreaming person, are not shared with him by the bystanders, or companions; whereas the members of the circle at a Spiritist séance perceive the same form, witness the same writing, hear the same voice, hold intelligent communication with the same external agent; and the medium equally, if he be not entranced. Inasmuch that Von Hartmann has to resort to the extraordinary supplementary hypothesis that, while these manifestations are the result of the medium's private somnambulant imagination, or (as he also says), of his "hallucinations," the objective character of them, their perception by so many others, is a result of all the other persons being infected with his hallucinations, mesmerised by him; and the knowledge displayed by these abnormal agents is from the "masked somnambulant consciousness" of medium or circle.

I call this hypothesis "extraordinary," because I think its entertainment is only to be accounted for by the fact avowed by Von Hartmann that he has never personally attended a séance. Had he done so, I suppose it would have been quite impossible for him to have put forward this notion. That a lot of different people, of diverse temperaments, who are, as often as not, discussing the last new play, or talking and joking about some topic entirely foreign to the experience in question, should be, without their suspecting it, thus all hallucinated and mesmerised simultaneously by the medium, is too extravagant an idea to be entertained for a moment by anyone who has ever been present at a materialisation or slate-writing séance. And, therefore, the question remains how do the private hallucinations of the medium get themselves made into objective perceptions for any amount of indifferent (not necessarily expectant, or hysterical) people? How do they hold conversations with these people, and give them information? Do the people you seem to meet in a dream, do the people a madman, or delirious person seems to meet, also hold conversations with me, and give me information, if I happen to be near at hand? Besides which, as I have already said, if the medium be not in trance, he certainly has no such somnambulant or hallucinatory consciousness as is imputed to him, but on the contrary sees, converses with, and touches these external agents for the first time, just as do the other members of the circle. If ever such theories are accepted, all criteria for the ascertainment of external objective reality will be null and void; the consequences of which may be serious. But dreaming, I think, gives no countenance to any such theories as these. For in dreams, either (as I believe) the dream personages who converse with the sleepers are verily spirits (or at least, the experiences proceed from intelligent agents external to the sleeper), or again (and perhaps the fact is made up of both alternatives), these personages and their converse are a creation of the sleeper's own imagination, just as the personages of a drama are the creation of the poet. But in either case there is no warrant for the notion of a division of the one self into several distinct selves. For consider that, in a dream, we always identify ourselves, as distinguished from the personages who seem to converse with us, or act independently of us. We hear them talk, or we witness their action; but they are always objective or external to us, just as the people we meet waking are—we are never behind, or within their subjectivity; never identify ourselves with them; on the contrary, they surprise us with unexpected deeds or speeches. But even if they are all our own creation, they never act externally, objectively, so as to be perceptible to others. It is true we may imagine ourselves to be what and where we are said by others not to be—what and where we do not suppose ourselves to be in our waking state. So also may a somnambule, or a madman, imagine himself what and where others do not believe him to be. But, though Von Hartmann urges this, it is really no support to his theory at all. In these cases we have simply a subjective experience, whatever the explanation of it may be. We have no contemporaneous subjective experience of an opposite kind belonging to the same person. It is one continuous experience, not two of opposite kinds, mutually exclusive of each other. The sleeper, or madman does not suppose himself to be two people at the same moment; at least I never heard of such a case. Even if he did, that would still be a different thing. For his own one self-identifying consciousness would still include these different personalities; whereas here there are two personalities, each obstinately refusing to identify himself with the other, and no common Ego, or self, to reconcile them in one consciousness. And surely if two consciousnesses stand face to face, and deny that they belong to the same Ego, it can hardly be supposed that they will have any future opportunity more favourable than this for correction of their presumed mistake!

*May not madness be due to converse with, and continuous dominant suggestion from, unseen agents, whether genii, or demons, in the sense of departed spirits; the proper self-mastery of the sufferer being, from some cause, enfeebled? I never read a more obvious case of what a very old-fashioned book calls possession than the case of mesmeric cure related by a foreign gentleman in a recent number of the Journal of Psychical Research; though doubtless one ought to apologise to "culture" for adopting so old-world a solution, bran-new explanations being so notoriously preferable to those entertained "scamper, ubique, et ab omnibus."

But one mesmerised subject (see "Stages of Hypnotism," by Mr. E. Gurney, Proceedings, S.P.R., January, 1884) said he felt as "if he had two selves, one watching the other." Now the worst of philosophers is that they will insist on reducing these poetic, metaphorical "as ifs" to the literal prose of the analytic, dogma-casting faculty. Of course, in a sense, we are not two, but a myriad people—think of the ancestral, and present influences that go to shape us, so that now one character, or mood is uppermost, now another—but that does not mean that we literally consist of a myriad incommunicable compartments, incommunicable, since, though the experience of one may occasionally slip into another, it does not any the more get recognised as ours, so that the compartments ever remain incommunicable. That is the prose, and falsehood version of this mystery of life, not to be squeezed into any propositions, that do not need to be instantly set against their opposites. Thus Calvinism is the understanding's false and prose version of St. Paul's doctrine, so terribly and vitally true, of the two conflicting moral natures in one man. Thus "Esoteric Buddhism" seems to me a very clever, but untrue, because prosaic, version of the grand old Buddhism of venerable Hindu genius. Truth cast into dogmas by the intellect is true no longer, because it has lost life and flexibility. Truth is Proteus, and will not be holden in any one definite form. The Occultist doctrine of "shells," again, seems to me a prose-travesty of the view which we owe, I think, to the very distinguished young Brahmin thinker, Mr. Mohini Chatterji, that hauntings of houses by the victims of a murder (which appears so strange and unjust) may be due to the thoughts of the victim reverting to the place, not to his whole, perpetual presence there. And may we not hope that the same is true even of spirits we name "earth-bound" also? that they are not so absolutely?

Again, a great dramatist undoubtedly passes into, and lives in his characters. Shakespeare is Hamlet, the gravedigger, Falstaff, and Desdemona. But though the transitions of his multifarious experience are swift, is he all these simultaneously? He is potentially; yet not literally, actually all these: in one sense he also stands afar off, contemplating these and unparticipating, as Coleridge says, "in the passions" of his puppets. Yet is he not also possessed, inspired by veritable personages representative of the type created, with whom his own many-sided nature is in sympathy?—if it were only by the people he has met, and so to speak, lived through, as well as with? For is not their influence a part of their very being? And still he is Shakespeare all the time, with his own royal manner of comprehending and creating. He is the men and women of his dramas, plus Shakespeare.

But it may be asked if I do not admit that some actions are performed by us without consciousness? I should reply that such actions are not, strictly speaking, performed by us at all—reflex motions are not, certainly. They are either the inherited nature, or the habit-engrained movements of the organism, which is intimately associated with ourselves, and co-operates with our thought, emotion, and volition, but which also belongs to the external world, or system—we being, more or less, in harmony with that world, or system—acting upon it, while it acts upon us—forming, indeed, in it and with it, a great solitary organism. Of many actions, however, we are sub-conscious, i.e., momentarily and superficially aware of them, though the main stress of attention is directed elsewhere, and such experience we easily forget; it is somewhat apt to be effaced by the more salient and impressive characteristics of the simultaneous experience. But, nevertheless, at the time, the same self-identifying consciousness took them all in, and made them part and parcel of one self. The phenomena of "double-consciousness," again, lend no support to these theories, because they, though very extraordinary, and difficult to explain without calling in the conception of another alien, or more than one other alien personality, are continuous, or successive in time, not contemporaneous. One person may either gradually, or suddenly change in the nature of his experience, even character, the past, or a portion of it, becoming a blank in memory; and the alternating periods sharply marking off these changes (as in certain diseases) may ultimately be embraced in one profounder and wider consciousness: the phenomena of hypnotism give remarkable facts of this kind (but here we have the external intelligent agency one is inclined to postulate in such instances); so we may conceive that successive lives may ultimately be gathered up into the memory of one self. But contemporaneous, though mutually exclusive, consciousnesses cannot, without absurdity and self-contradiction, I believe, be attributed to one self.

And I maintain this, although I quite feel the necessity of recognising an absolute transcendent self—or rather many, eternally distinct, though also eternally harmonious, and one, since no otherwise can I comprehend the origin, ground, and substantial, spontaneous activity ("free-will") of the imperfectly developed, and successive personalities, of which we are now each of us self-conscious. As I have explained in my (Academy) essay on Von Hartmann's philosophy, this alone would seem capable of fulfilling all the important functions which he attributes to the "Unconscious," but which the unconscious would assuredly (as it appears to me) be quite incapable of fulfilling; yet a transcendent consciousness there must be over and above the time-consciousness, to supplement, explain, and give it the requisite support; while truly this is largely cut off and removed from our experience of the passing moment. Hence, my own conception may be thought chargeable with some of the difficulties I charge upon the hypothesis I here combat. To some extent that may be so, but I believe only to some extent.

Of course the somnambule, before it enters into temporal experience, may be said to be transcendent, but that is true equally of the normal, every-day experience, and yet the latter is not, therefore, taken for the experience of a stranger. Why, then, should the former be so mistaken, when that enters the field of temporal vision? Von Hartmann says the same regarding his "middle-brain" consciousness. But if it is not subjectively penetrated, only objectively apprehended, then it certainly is not ours, whatever part of the brain, or no-brain it may come from. Then is it truly a guide, or control, or intelligence external to the medium, as it claims to be. It may be using the medium's brain, or nerve-force, or muscles, or vocal organs, or even his whole body, (see "M.A. (Oxon)" and Wallace on Materialisations) "transfiguring" that; but it is not himself.

Of course I admit the difficulty of conceiving this intuition belonging to our being out of time, and not fully grasped by us, because we are limited to the time-mode of conceiving. Yet I cannot think this equal to the gratuitous paradox of supposing ten or more simultaneous consciousnesses of ours all knowable and ex hypothesi actually known (by some one) under the form of time, yet, though thus known under the form of time, not known by us to be ours. No one pretends that either of these is eternal, for all are assumed to be in time.

WAS SHAKESPEARE A SPIRITUALIST?—As I have said, says John Fraser, in Mind in Nature, in a long article upon the supernatural in Shakespeare, almost all Shakespeare's noblest work is tipped with a supernatural tinge, as witness "Julius Cæsar," "Antony and Cleopatra," and even "Cymbeline"—though the vision which blots the last act of that charming play is almost certainly an interpolation by some much inferior hand; but he who would understand the spiritual development of the dramatist must study these four plays: "A Midsummer Night's Dream," "Hamlet," "Macbeth," and "The Tempest."

WITCHCRAFT AND THE WATER-ORDEAL.

By CARL DU PREL,

Author of "The Philosophy of Mysticism."

(Condensed from Dr. Rohner's Translation from the German in the Harbinger of Light of July and August.)

II.

In the Vienne Gazette, No. 67, of 1728, another phenomenon is noted. An official report is there given of certain alleged witches, imprisoned in Szegedin, being subjected to the water-ordeal, and who, on their floating, were put in a balance and found to weigh only some ounces.

This abnormal levity was found not to be constant. Hermann (see Le Brun, II., 137) gives an account of some rogues who, knowing that they were of the ordinary weight in swimming, submitted themselves to the ordeal, when, to their dismay, they found themselves unable to get under the surface of the water. This variability being verified, the phenomenon ought to have been properly studied, but it was not; the recognition of it, however, led to the ordeal being abandoned as a witch-test.

All attempts at explanation of such phenomena in the Middle Ages were found inadequate and inconclusive. William Scribonius, one of the professors at Marsburg, who witnessed a witch-trial by the ordeal at Lenge, explained in writing to the magistrates there that "the devil being as light as air, he could confer his own lightness upon those he was possessed of." But he seemed subsequently not to be content with this explanation, for in his book about witches he attributes their "not sinking in water, in which they were baptised into the Church, to the water's hatefully refusing to receive them after they had become imps of Satan." A similar view was taken by James I. of England, who held that "the reason of water not receiving witches into its bosom was that it had a horror of them from their having cast off belief in God and Jesus Christ." (Görres V., 546.)

In Holland, at a witch-trial, in 1594, the professors of the University of Leyden were referred to for their opinion. They answered that the water-ordeal could not be regarded as valid, seeing that water was not of itself able to enter into considerations and come to a conclusion. "If the water," they asked, "is not capable of finding witches guilty, how could the earth bear them up and permit them to breathe the air of life?" They regarded the fact of their not sinking as beyond question, and opined that their arms being crossed, and their hands and feet bound together, their bodies were brought into boat-form, and thus enabled to float." (Soldan V., 513.)

The devout St. Osmar, being shipwrecked, was tossed about on the water for hours before being rescued. Christians, who believed that Jesus Christ and St. Peter walked on the water, attributed her not sinking to the fact of her holding a blessed crucifix in her hand. (Görres II., 284.)

Not more satisfactory were subsequent explanations; for example, Dr. Charbonnier, in his book on the "Disorders and Faculties of Mystics," says: "In the Middle Ages hysterical subjects, called witches, who floated on water by reason of their loss of gravity, were burned because such floating was held to be supernatural."

Temporary lightness of the body has been ascertained to be connected with the ecstatic condition, so frequently observed in the early martyrs of the Church. Accepting then the ecstatic or somnambulant condition as a factor in the inquiry, let us glance down the list of observed facts recorded to the present time.

Dr. Franklin relates that once, while bathing, he was taken with sleep, and lay, unconscious, floating face upwards, on the water.

Brière de Boissaut, in his "Hallucinations," 311, relates the case of a man who, rising in the night, walked in his sleep into the sea, and was picked up floating a mile from the shore in a somnambulant state.

Guodin, in his "Magnetisme Animal," I., 63, gives an account of a Neapolitan, attached to the Court, who, while bathing, found himself involuntarily floating without effort on his own part.

Baxter, in his "World of Spirits," narrates the case of a woman, suffering from melancholia, who threw herself into the water, on which she floated for three hours; that when she was got out her body felt quite light; and that her prolonged bath cured her of the melancholia.

Despine relates, in Pigeaire's "Electricité Animal," 275, the case of a girl, eleven years old, who floated in the sea on her first entering it.

Dr. Koroff wrote to Deleuze about a woman who, when in the somnambulant state, went into the sea as if it were her native element; that once, while in the trance, she said that she must be willed not to go into the sea, for if she woke in it she would drown.

Körner says of the Soeress of Prevorst that when put into her bath while in the magnetic sleep, she vibrated all over as if pervaded by currents of electricity, and she would have been shot out of it if she had not been pressed under. Körner says that he had no doubt that she would have floated if she had been thrown into the river, as was the case with witches.

The same phenomena were observed alike among those who, in the Middle Ages, were called "Demoniacs" among "Christian Mystics," as well as among the Brahmins and Fakirs of India, not forgetting the Neo-Platonists of Egypt.

But what is strongly to our point is this, that the same phenomena occur in our midst at the present time, offering us every facility for studying them: they present themselves abundantly in induced somnambulism, on which subject we have a vast store of trustworthy records.

At this point, concludes Du Prel, we pause for the present.

A TEST.—"I have been to a séance for materialisation here, in Auckland. I provided a test in the form of a sheet of cardboard well blackened with smoke. This I placed quite beyond the reach of any one occupying the medium's seat. While sitting in the dark all were in contact including the medium; I held one of his hands. The signal for 'light' was given by the sounding of a bell, none of our hands being able to reach it, and on the blackened card was the imprint of a hand. The medium's hand was found partially blackened as if it had been lightly laid upon it, the card being out of his reach, and his hands being held. Subsequent experiments showed that his wearing apparel could be similarly impressed by the black on the card. While sitting in a subdued light, all within ten feet of the medium were touched; we saw, now and then, an arm and hand emerging from the medium, waving about, and we inferred that the touches were by an arm and hand materialised from him."—W. D. CAMPBELL, Auckland, in Harbinger of Light.

MESMERIC CURE.—Having received letters of inquiry in respect to the cure of paralysis in Whitstable, we communicated with our correspondent, who writes: "Mr. Thorpe, a gentleman residing at Argyle Villa, Whitstable, had for four years been paralysed on the left side, and partially deprived of the use of his limbs. He was able to walk with difficulty, and he was helpless in cutting his food, being obliged to keep his left hand in a sling. He had the best medical advice, but to no purpose. Some time since he made the acquaintance of Mr. F. T. Beckett, of Clayton Villa, Whitstable, who is a believer in animal magnetism, and last Saturday week the latter gentleman placed Mr. Thorpe under his influence. The operation has since been repeated several times, with the result of Mr. Thorpe having the free use of his arm, hand, and leg, which, as we have said, he had not enjoyed for four years. He may be seen walking briskly along the street, carrying his stick under his arm, and a week ago last Thursday, as a further proof of his activity, he indulged in a run round his garden. Mr. Thorpe says he has reason to be thankful that he came to Whitstable and made the acquaintance of Mr. Beckett. He writes: 'It is no quack affair, but a wonderful cure, and ought for the sake of other sufferers to be made known. I can scarcely realise it myself.'"—Daily Chronicle.

MARVELLOUS INVENTION!—A correspondent calls attention to the Dunelm Evening Telegraph (September 9th), which quotes the following from a Chicago paper: "A gentleman, whom we call Mr. Holland, of Lincoln, Nebraska, declares that he has made a discovery by which he can demonstrate scientifically the existence of the soul. Mr. Holland is a man of small stature, thoughtful countenance, and is a devout Christian. He holds the theory that the human soul is the counterpart of the body; and he thought that by an arrangement of microscopes he might aid his dull eyes to see it. His attention was first drawn to the question, he says, by hearing a man reclining on a couch complain of severe pain in his foot, although his leg had been amputated years before above the knee. 'For years,' says Mr. Holland, 'this incident was present to my mind, until at last I resolved upon an experiment. I procured the most powerful lenses I could and completed an invention of my own, and when I had my light arranged perfectly, so that I could examine the microbes of the air, I called upon a friend who had lost his arm and explained that I wanted him to put his viewless hand under inspection. He accompanied me to my rooms, and the moment I adjusted the glass a revelation broke upon me. The dual hand lay beneath my glass. I asked him to make letters with his (to himself) viewless finger. He did so, and to my astonishment I spelled out the sentences he wrote. That was conclusive evidence to me,' concludes Mr. Holland."

WHAT IS SAID OF PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

J. H. FICHTE, THE GERMAN PHILOSOPHER AND AUTHOR.—"Notwithstanding my age (83) and my exemption from the controversies of the day, I feel it my duty to bear testimony to the great fact of Spiritualism. No one should keep silent."

PROFESSOR DE MORGAN, PRESIDENT OF THE MATHEMATICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.—"I am perfectly convinced that I have both seen and heard, in a manner which should make unbelief impossible, things called spiritual, which cannot be taken by a rational being to be capable of explanation by imposture, coincidence, or mistake. So far I feel the ground firm under me."

DR. ROBERT CHAMBERS.—"I have for many years known that these phenomena are real, as distinguished from impostures; and it is not of yesterday that I concluded they were calculated to explain much that has been doubtful in the past; and, when fully accepted, revolutionise the whole frame of human opinion on many important matters."—Extract from a Letter to A. Russell Wallace.

PROFESSOR HARE, EMERITUS PROFESSOR OF CHEMISTRY IN THE UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA.—"Far from abating my confidence in the inferences respecting the agencies of the spirits of deceased mortals, in the manifestations of which I have given an account in my work, I have, within the last nine months" (this was written in 1858), "had more striking evidences of that agency than those given in the work in question."

PROFESSOR CHALLIS, THE LATE PLUMERIAN PROFESSOR OF ASTRONOMY AT CAMBRIDGE.—"I have been unable to resist the large amount of testimony to such facts, which has come from many independent sources, and from a vast number of witnesses. . . . In short, the testimony has been so abundant and conscientious, that either the facts must be admitted to be such as are reported, or the possibility of certifying facts by human testimony must be given up."—Clerical Journal, June, 1862.

PROFESSOR GREGORY, F.R.S.E.—"The essential question is this, What are the proofs of the agency of departed spirits? Although I cannot say that I yet feel the sure and firm conviction on this point which I feel on some others, I am bound to say that the higher phenomena, recorded by so many truthful and honourable men, appear to me to render the spiritual hypothesis almost certain. . . . I believe that if I could myself see the higher phenomena alluded to I should be satisfied, as are all those who have had the best means of judging of the truth of the spiritual theory."

LORD BROUGHAM.—"There is but one question I would ask the author, Is the Spiritualism of this work foreign to our materialistic, manufacturing age? No; for amidst the varieties of mind which diverse circumstances produce are found those who cultivate man's highest faculties; to these the author addresses himself. But even in the most cloudless skies of scepticism I see a rain-cloud, if it be no bigger than a man's hand; it is modern Spiritualism."—Preface by Lord Brougham to "The Book of Nature." By C. O. Groom Napier, F.C.S.

THE LONDON DIALECTICAL COMMITTEE reported: "1. That sounds of a very varied character, apparently proceeding from articles of furniture, the floor and walls of the room—the vibrations accompanying which sounds are often distinctly perceptible to the touch—occur, without being produced by muscular action or mechanical contrivance. 2. That movements of heavy bodies take place without mechanical contrivance of any kind, or adequate exertion of muscular force by those present, and frequently without contact or connection with any person. 3. That these sounds and movements often occur at the time and in the manner asked for by persons present, and, by means of a simple code of signals, answer questions and spell out coherent communications."

PROFESSOR BARRETT, F.R.S.E.—"I know and rejoice in the blessing Spiritualism has been to my own faith, and to that of several dear friends of mine. Moreover, I cordially recognise the fact that in bereavement and deep distress numbers have been cheered and consoled by the hope that Spiritualism has set before them. . . . So far from Materialism being true, I do not believe a single person has ever yet lived on this earth who has truly and heartily desired to know if an intelligent and personal existence be possible without our present bodily organism, and has steadily set himself to solve this supreme question with all the help he can gain from every source.—I say I do not believe any such earnest seeker after truth has ever failed to obtain a clear and definite answer in the affirmative."

CAMILLE FLAMMARION, THE FRENCH ASTRONOMER, AND MEMBER OF THE ACADEMIE FRANCAISE.—"I do not hesitate to affirm my conviction, based on personal examination of the subject, that any scientific man who declares the phenomena denominated 'magnetic,' 'somnambulic,' 'mediumic,' and others not yet explained by science to be 'impossible,' is one who speaks without knowing what he is talking about; and also any man accustomed, by his professional avocations, to scientific observation—provided that his mind be not blinded by pre-conceived opinions, nor his mental vision blinded by that opposite kind of illusion, unhappily too common in the learned world, which consists in imagining that the laws of Nature are already known to us, and that everything which appears to overstep the limit of our present formulas is impossible—may acquire a radical and absolute certainty of the reality of the facts alluded to."

CROSWELL F. VARLEY, F.R.S.—"Twenty-five years ago I was a hard-headed unbeliever. . . . Spiritual phenomena, however, suddenly and quite unexpectedly, were soon after developed in my own family. . . . This led me to inquire and to try numerous experiments in such a way as to preclude, as much as circumstances would permit, the possibility of trickery and self-deception. . . . He then details various phases of the phenomena which had come within the range of his personal experience, and continues: "Other and numerous phenomena have occurred, proving the existence (a) of forces unknown to science; (b) the power of instantly reading my thoughts; (c) the presence of some intelligence or intelligences controlling those powers. . . . That the phenomena occur there is overwhelming evidence, and it is too late now to deny their existence."

ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, F.G.S.—"My position, therefore, is that the phenomena of Spiritualism in their entirety do not require further confirmation. They are proved, quite as well as any facts are proved in other sciences, and it is not denial or quibbling that can disprove any of them, but only fresh facts and accurate deductions from those facts. When the opponents of Spiritualism can give a record of their researches approaching in duration and completeness to those of its advocates; and when they can discover and show in detail, either how the phenomena are produced or how the many sane and able men here referred to have been deluded into a coincident belief that they have witnessed them; and when they can prove the correctness of their theory by producing a like belief in a body of equally sane and able unbelievers—then, and not till then, will it be necessary for Spiritualists to produce fresh confirmation of facts which are, and always have been, sufficiently real and indisputable to satisfy any honest and persevering inquirer."—Miracles and Modern Spiritualism.

DR. LOCKHART ROBERTSON.—"The writer" (i.e., Dr. L. Robertson) "can now no more doubt the physical manifestations of so-called Spiritualism than he would any other fact, as, for example, the fall of the apple to the ground, of which his senses informed him. As stated above, there was no place or chance of any legerdemain, or fraud, in these physical manifestations. He is aware, even from recent experience, of the impossibility of convincing anyone, by a mere narrative of events apparently so out of harmony with all our knowledge of the laws which govern the physical world, and he places these facts on record rather as an act of justice due to those whose similar statements he had elsewhere doubted and denied, than with either the desire or hope of convincing others. Yet he cannot doubt the ultimate recognition of facts of the truth of which he is so thoroughly convinced. Admit these physical manifestations, and a strange and wide world of research is opened to our inquiry. This field is new to the materialist mind of the last two centuries, which even in the writings of divines of the English Church, doubts and denies all spiritual manifestations and agencies, be they good or evil."—From a letter by Dr. Lockhart Robertson, published in the Dialectical Society's Report on Spiritualism, p. 24.

NASSAU WILLIAM SENIOR.—"No one can doubt that phenomena like these (Phrenology, Homeopathy, and Mesmerism) deserve to be observed, recorded, and arranged; and whether we call by the name of mesmerism, or by any other name, the science which proposes to do this, is a mere question of nomenclature. Among those who profess this science there may be careless observers, prejudiced recorders, and rash systematisers; their errors and defects may impede the progress of knowledge, but they will not stop it. And we have no doubt that, before the end of this century, the wonders which perplex almost equally those who accept and those who reject modern mesmerism will be distributed into defined classes, and found subject to ascertained laws—in other words, will become the subjects of a science." These views will prepare us for the following statement, made in the Spiritual Magazine, 1864, p. 336: "We have only to add, as a further tribute to the attainments and honours of Mr. Senior, that he was by long inquiry and experience a firm believer in spiritual power and manifestations. Mr. Home was his frequent guest, and Mr. Senior made no secret of his belief among his friends. He it was who recommended the publication of Mr. Home's recent work by Messrs. Longmans, and he authorised the publication, under initials, of one of the striking incidents there given, which happened to a near and dear member of his family."

WHAT CONJURERS SAY ABOUT PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

Mediums, who are the instruments of an external agency, have, more than once, been confronted with conjurers who deceive by sleight of hand; and in the same manner that no man of science who has thoroughly and fairly investigated the phenomena has failed to become convinced of their reality, so no conjurer who has been confronted with the same facts has been able to explain their occurrence by prestidigitation. Houdin, Jacobs, Bellachini, Hermann, Kellar, and others have already confessed their powerlessness to produce under the same conditions what occurs without human intervention in the presence of a medium.

Testimony of Robert Houdin.

The Marquis Endes de Mirville published during the lifetime of Houdin two letters from the latter, in his "Mémoire adressé à MM. les membres de l'Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques, sur un grand nombre de phénomènes merveilleux intéressant également la Religion, la Science, et les hommes du Monde," in which the conjurer confesses his inability to explain the phenomena he witnessed in the presence of Alexis, the clairvoyant. A circumstantial account is given of M. de Mirville's visit to Houdin for the purpose of engaging him in this investigation, of the latter's confidence in his own ability to detect the trick, and of what took place at the séance, the conditions of which were entirely under Houdin's control. This account extends over twelve pages, and its accuracy is confirmed by Houdin in the first of the documents now translated:—

"Although very far from accepting the eulogies which M. — is good enough to bestow upon me, and especially insisting that I am not at all committed to opinions, either in favour of magnetism or against it, I can, nevertheless, not refrain from declaring that the facts above reported are entirely correct (sont de la plus complète exactitude), and that, the more I reflect upon them, the more impossible I find it to rank them among those which belong to my art and profession.

"4th May, 1847. ROBERT HOUDIN."

A fortnight later, M. de Mirville received another letter, in which the following, referring to another séance, occurs:—

"I have, therefore, returned from this séance as astonished as it is possible to be, and persuaded that it is utterly impossible that chance or skill could ever produce effects so wonderful (tout à fait impossible que le hasard ou l'adresse puisse jamais produire des effets aussi merveilleux).— I am, monsieur, &c.,

"May 16th, 1847. (Signed) ROBERT HOUDIN."

Testimony of Harry Kellar.

Harry Kellar, a distinguished professor of legerdemain, investigated the slate-writing phenomena which occurred in the presence of Mr. Eglinton, at Calcutta, in January, 1882, and on the 25th of that month he addressed a letter to the editor of the Indian Daily News, in which he said:—

"In your issue of the 13th January I stated that I should be glad of an opportunity of participating in a séance with a view of giving an unbiased opinion as to whether, in my capacity of a professional prestidigitator, I could give a natural explanation of effects said to be produced by spiritual aid.

"I am indebted to the courtesy of Mr. Eglinton, the Spiritualistic medium now in Calcutta, and of his host, Mr. J. Meugens, for affording me the opportunity I craved.

"It is needless to say I went as a sceptic, but I must own that I have come away utterly unable to explain, by any natural means, the phenomena that I witnessed on Tuesday evening. I will give a brief description of what took place."

After describing several successful experiments, Mr. Kellar proceeds:—

"In respect to the above manifestations, I can only say that I do not expect my account of them to gain general credence. Forty-eight hours before I should not have believed anyone who described such manifestations under similar circumstances. I still remain a sceptic as regards Spiritualism, but I repeat my inability to explain or account for what must have been an intelligent force that produced the writing on the slate, which, if my senses are to be relied on, was in no way the result of trickery or sleight of hand."

On the 30th of the same month Mr. Kellar addressed another letter to the Indian Daily News, reporting some experiences of another kind with Mr. Eglinton, and regarding which he said:—

"In conclusion, let me state that after a most stringent trial and strict scrutiny of these wonderful experiences I can arrive at no other conclusion than that there was no trace of trickery in any form; nor was there in the room any mechanism or machinery by which could be produced the phenomena which had taken place. The ordinary mode by which Maskelyne and other conjurers imitate levitation or the floating test could not possibly be done in the room in which we were assembled."

The Testimony of Professor Jacobs.

Professor Jacobs, writing to the editor of Licht, nach Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—

"Spite of the assertions, more or less trustworthy, of the French and English journalists, and spite of the foolish jealousies of ignorant conjurers, I feel it my duty to show up the bad faith of one party and the chicanery of the other. All that has been said or done adverse to these American mediums is absolutely untrustworthy. If we would rightly judge of a thing we must understand it, and neither the journalists nor the conjurers possessed the most elementary knowledge of the science that governs these phenomena. As a prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the mediumistic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect.

"Messrs. Robis, and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. If (as I have every reason to hope) the psychical studies, to which I am applying myself at this time, succeed, I shall be able to establish clearly, and that by public demonstration, the immense line of demarcation which separates mediumistic phenomena from conjuring proper, and then equivocation will be no longer possible, and persons will have to yield to evidence, or deny through predetermination to deny."

"Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also the individuality of the spirit in 'spiritual manifestation.' I authorise you, dear sir, to insert this letter in your next number, if agreeable to you, &c., &c."

Testimony of Samuel Bellachini.

Samuel Bellachini, Court Conjurer at Berlin, made the following declaration in December, 1877:—

"I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Berne; Butlerof, in St. Petersburg, to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the 'How' of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a notary and witnesses.

"Berlin, December 6th, 1877. (Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI."

ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By "M.A. (Oxon)."

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct séances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experiences in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two, of negative, passive temperament, and preferably of the female sex, the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each sitter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Scepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitter spirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear. Patience is essential, and it may be necessary to meet ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such a trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful séance.

The first indications of success usually are a cold breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twitchings of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not aiding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over, but not in contact with, it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if the attempt to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might disconcert an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will check noisy manifestations.

Lastly, Try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your reason. Do not enter into a very solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well-grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.

A PROBLEM FOR CONJURERS.

BY CARL DU PREL. (Munich.)

(Translated by V.)

"Quam multa fieri non posse, priusquam facta sint, judicantur."

Others again will doubt, because they are only able to believe in such things as, however wonderful they may be, are of such everyday occurrence that the impression made upon their minds is an ordinary one; such, for instance, as the power of attraction of the magnet. These confound, therefore, the subjective habit of the mind with objective proof. They are stupefied by being accustomed to the sight of everyday things, and take no heed of metaphysical marvels happening around them. Therefore they lack the very groundwork of philosophy, and are incapable of comprehending that the most everyday events are at the bottom as incomprehensible as mystical ones; that the fall of a stone is really as great a riddle as the above-mentioned slate-writing. Whatever may happen in the world, whether it occurs daily or only in one instance, there is no difference in the comprehension of the two things.

The scientific sceptics proceed differently. First among them are those who declare all mysticism to be humbug. These, as a rule, are specialists. Permeated with a firm scientific conviction, they deny everything which is contrary to this. They are à priori just because they have a scientific conviction; a man must indeed be very learned to be able to be an à priori. This would be in favour of such a disposition of mind. In the case of other learned persons, their antagonism is on moral grounds. They are sceptics because a single fact of such weight as slate-writing upsets their whole theories, founded upon the labour of years, to teach which is their calling. They do not possess the elasticity of mind to be able, or the moral force to be willing, to unlearn and to confess their previous errors. Others, again, would not themselves be disinclined to enter upon the research into mystic phenomena; but they shrink before the existing prejudices, they fear to draw upon themselves the ridicule which is attached to those who have the courage to confess what they have seen with their own eyes of a mystic nature. In this case the ground of scepticism is likewise a moral one, that of vanity. Such people should, however, remember that in ten years' time all this probably will be changed. Facts are stubborn things; they may be ignored or denied for a long time, but in the end they must be acknowledged, since they possess a far greater amount of vitality than mere à priori mental theories. This kind of vanity finds, therefore, its reward even at the present time; but since the facts in question are within the reach of everyone, this scepticism of vanity will eventually be condemned, and indeed very soon.

Other learned people fear the consequences which will result from their acknowledging even one mystic fact—they imagine that thereby a blow will be dealt to science. This, however, would certainly not be the case. If we acknowledge what is demonstrated by the phenomenon of slate-writing, then mankind will only return to a belief which they have always held in conjunction with science, with the exception of during the last 150 years: the belief in immortality. Only so-called enlightenment, and not true science, can suffer by the recognition of facts. Nothing will take place except that men will be radically cured of their materialism, for that is a certainty. The materialistic trash, so long an anachronism, which a Vogt, a Büchner and a Consorten have dared to put before the German public in ever new essays and pamphlets will no more be seen. Science, however, will not be a sufferer by this; on the contrary, such a purification will prove that better and more correct views bring a better condition of social life in their train, while the blossoms of our materialism will show themselves in riot, dynamite explosions, crashes on the Stock Exchange, and sensuality.

There is, therefore, no doubt about this: our men of learning will be obliged to reckon with facts, whether they will or no. And if they will not give in to professional mediums, upon whom it is so easy to cast suspicion, they must be convinced by private mediums, of whom there are already many in every class of society, and who will not always remain hidden as they are now. In ten years' time professional mediums will enjoy a very different social position to what they do at the present; they will be recognised as valuable instruments for scientific investigation. If anyone takes umbrage at the profession, he is advised to experiment with a private medium. He will assuredly become convinced, if he, like myself, has seen and heard for the space of an hour, physical phenomena in full light with a private medium of high social position; or witnessed, as I did with a private medium, who was a member of the Academy, a Latin quotation written on the ceiling, while the medium was in a state of trance. The simplest hypothesis in the latter case is that of the writing being done by a materialised hand, to which, however, the corresponding organism must have been present. If, however, it be asserted that such writings, the first historical example of which is the "Mene Tekel" of Belshazzar, are executed in inaccessible places through the magic power of the medium himself, such a hypothesis is, at least, open to discussion. But this theory, advanced by Schindler and Perty, suggests in itself the acknowledgment of a transcendental being outside of ourselves, because a being furnished with magic powers and not fettered to the body of clay cannot be looked upon as mortal. It was, therefore, quite within the bounds of logic that Perty himself, when urged by further experience, abandoned this theory and recognised the intervention of transcendental beings.

As I said before, we cannot call these beings spirits. Spirits according to our ideas are only thinking, and immaterial; these beings, on the contrary, are capable of action and in some way material. Spirits have no form; but these beings must be allowed at least to have the potential capacity of making themselves visible in form. It is on this account that we must give up the dualistic theory of the soul, which represents man as compounded of two radically different substances, a material body and an immaterial soul. In its place we must set up the monistic soul-theory, the ground-work of which was already designed by Aristotle. As long as we do not do this, it is only pretension to call ourselves "Monists." We are only "Monists" when we derive body and soul from a third and common source, that, namely, of a transcendental being, which, while itself organised, at least potentially, is not only the thinking principle, but that likewise of organisation in us. Nature and spirit are thus monistically united in man. Now, such beings are capable of being represented empirically under favourable conditions, and therefore the logical deduction, to which we are urged by Monism, is confirmed by experience.

It is, indeed, most illogical to deny the transient materialisation of a transcendental being and not to wonder at the long existing materialisation of our life; the comparative can scarcely be denied when the superlative is a fact.

There are some sceptics, too, to whom the whole "spiritualism"—we have just shown that this designation is an incorrect one—is only the newest form of American humbug. Now, this shows want of historical knowledge. Among the ancient Hindoos and Egyptians, as well as by ourselves in the Middle Ages, far more was known on this subject than at the present day.

The whole land of the East is permeated even at the present time with mysticism. When I was speaking on this subject with Dr. Pruner-Bey, the late physician of the Viceroy of Egypt, during a visit to Pisa, he said: "Anyone who has lived in the East understands these things naturally; it is only we Europeans who know nothing about them." Let anyone read the Bible. If he is not versed in mysticism, it is quite incomprehensible; if he is, he can only look with pity on the rationalistic commentaries on this Book, which they place in this position: that the half of the facts in it are denied, and the other half misinterpreted.

There are, however, only two methods of becoming acquainted with this subject: either by means of reading or by seeing for one's self. Those who have no experience in either way are the most decided opponents. The truth of the proverb, "Culture makes men tolerant" (Bildung macht tolerant) is hereby verified. But anyone who despises both methods of instruction must be contented if his judgment is not regarded as of much weight.

I come back, therefore, to the words with which I commenced: Spiritualism must be investigated by science. There is necessity for this if it is only an epidemic, and still more if it is founded on truth. Should, however, the members of our Academy decline this investigation, then the harsh judgment pronounced by Schiller and Goethe, and in recent times by Schopenhauer and Hellenbach in many of their writings on our men of science, will soon become general.

I should look upon myself as a coward if I did not openly express my convictions. For through Eglinton I have received the proof that Zollner, who was the first in Germany to have courage to speak of these slate-writings, discovered a grand truth, and that all his opponents who have neither read nor seen anything in this domain are in the wrong.

If, however, this becomes the universal conviction—and it will not be long before this is the case—then this epoch will come in the development of German philosophy, when metaphysical individualism, confirmed by the facts of experience, will gain the victory over Materialism and Pantheism; for Materialism will be discarded with other old rubbish. Pantheism, however, will only survive in a transformed shape in which Individualism will be comprised.

PHASES OF MATERIALIZATION.

A CHAPTER OF RESEARCH IN THE OBJECTIVE PHENOMENA OF SPIRITUALISM.

(2) VARIETY OF FORMS.

A piece of evidence for the reality of these form-manifestations which has always seemed to me difficult to put aside is their extreme variety in the presence of some mediums during the course of a single séance. Especially does this strike the reader of such a book as Colonel Olcott's "People from the Other World." In the presence of William Eddy their name was legion. He himself is best described as a clumsy, loutish, plough-boy: heavy, and dull in movement, 5ft. 9in. in height, and weighing between twelve and thirteen stone. He came direct from his farm work into the cabinet, which he had no possible means of preparing. It contained no shelf or cupboard in which "properties" could by any possibility be hidden, and no ray of light afforded opportunity to this clumsy being to prepare himself for the personation of all the characters that were produced. Men, women, and children, of all ages, of every form of physique, of every variety of vivacious or stolid temperament, recognised by observers as friends of their own in many cases, stepped out of this dark hole and frequently vanished before they could get back to it. White men were succeeded by Indians; men of stalwart build came immediately after slender girls and children. Colonel Olcott, after elaborate and minute records of his prolonged experience, testifies* that he has "seen, say three or four hundred different materialized spirits, or what purported to be such, and in every imaginable variety of costume. They were of all sizes and shapes, of both sexes, and of all ages." To quote one case among many:—†

"An old gentlemanly-looking man with a fine, intellectual head" came out. His silver locks were brushed from either ear towards his crest, as if to conceal his baldness. He was dressed in a well-cut black coat, buttoned up high, and pantaloons to match. He spoke in a low voice.

"Then a child of fourteen, who was clothed in white, and smiled sweetly and recognised her mother who sat next to me." "The last form (on that evening) was Jeremiah McCready (also recognised) whose materialization was very strong and satisfactory."

It is not necessary for me to waste my readers' time and patience by going into elaborate calculations as to the amount of preparation that would have been necessary to carry on this elaborate system of imposture, if such it can be conceived to be: the stage-properties that must have been had, with no money to purchase them, no place where to hide them, and only a pitch-dark closet in which to use them, away in a lonely farm-house in Vermont, and, most inconceivable miracle of all, procured, used, and spirited away nightly by a clumsy, uneducated plough-boy, who must, furthermore, have been at the mercy of scores of accomplices, if he had not the magical power of Protean transformation of his own uncouth body. I do not say that this negative evidence is of any direct value for my present purposes; but it does unquestionably make the task of those who reject my explanation, and who substitute for it one of imposture, extremely difficult.

To take another point. We have abundance of evidence, where the introduction of accomplices is carefully guarded against, of the presentation of male forms when the medium is a woman, and vice versa. I have more than once mentioned the beautiful female form of the elder Katie King, Herne and Williams being the mediums. And not to multiply evidence, Mr. Charles Blackburn, a

A BENEFICENT WORK.

A few charitable persons, rather more than a year ago, started a home for little cripples, with the object of curing them, when possible, by magnetic rubbing under spiritual guidance. A lady, Mrs. Duncan, who is endowed with unusual healing powers, herself one of the founders, performs in a true Christian spirit the necessary ministrations. We paid a visit to the Home (7, Somerset-terrace, Carlton-road, Maida Vale), on Friday, October 30th, and were conducted over it by Mrs. Duncan, and by Mrs. Marshall, the matron. A very interesting case was first shown us, that of a middle-aged woman, at the Home under exceptional circumstances. She had been a patient in the wards of St. Bartholomew's Hospital for a long period, suffering from a contraction of the muscles of the legs. Attempts had been made there to straighten them by the application of heavy weights, which, while to a certain extent successful, had unfortunately the ulterior effect of still further weakening them. This particular affection was no doubt but one of several disorders of which the patient was the victim, and she was finally regarded as a hopeless case. Singularly enough, thereupon the assistance of Mrs. Duncan was sought, who attended continuously in the wards, and gave her best efforts to improve the patient's condition. Much progress was made, in spite of some difficulties, when it was prematurely decided that the patient should be dismissed as incurable. The poor woman had no home to go to but the workhouse, and the committee decided that she ought not to be abandoned to conditions so depressing, but that she should be brought to the Home. From the time of her arrival a great improvement has manifested itself. The legs, which were before little but skin and bone, are now gathering flesh, and at the same time the knees becoming more flexible. The general health is better, and the utterance, previously difficult and hesitating, has now become almost normal. The kindness with which the patient is treated, and the best of nourishment which she receives, must have their due share in the merits of her gradual recovery. We had now an opportunity of observing the process of rubbing. Mrs. Duncan passes the tips of her fingers lightly down the affected member, and occasionally presses it softly with the entire palm of her hand. The patient immediately feels a warm tingling sensation, and in a brief time begins to move the limb more easily. One of us asked that he might himself experience the influence, and extending his hand was struck with the genial warmth which seemed to enter it. Mrs. Duncan's hand has always this genial warmth. He was much surprised, however, to learn that Mrs. Duncan herself felt a healing influence from his hand, and he had the unexpected felicity of curing her arm of a slight rheumatic affection by a few downward passes of his fingers.

We next ascended the stairs, and as we did so were greeted from an upper chamber with a babble of infantine voices, and upon entering beheld a group of about nine children, boys and girls, some standing, leaning on their crutches, some sitting on low chairs, and some on the floor, all engaged in a kind of serious happy conversation. We were introduced to the little elders and, taking them upon our knees, learnt the troublous histories which, while not eclipsing, had softened the merry vivacity of their childish faces with something of the patient serenity of age. Imperfect nourishment, resulting in rickety and otherwise diseased bones, seemed in most of them to be the cause of their misfortune. One was a little foundling, taken from a workhouse, with a weak hip-joint; another, a boy with the large head of rickets and with limbs which had been the despair of the surgeons, but now so improved as to startle the most orthodox; another, a little girl whose leg had been cut off close to the high joint; pieces of bone still keep working to the surface, but inflammation and collection of matter seem to be prevented by the magnetic stroking. It must be mentioned that if any serious symptoms manifest themselves medical assistance is always sought, nor is the aid of medicine, in the daily routine, altogether dispensed with. It is not sought to rival the Peculiar People by any fanatical exclusive adhesion to one idea. A fourth child was a little girl who owes her affection primarily to a fall. She has a curved spine and protruding chest. She is rubbed, but assistance is also sought from a close-fitting leather jacket. The bright intelligent child, however, evidently preferred the first to the second method of treatment. The description of these few cases will be sufficient to enable our readers to understand the beneficent work that is being done. It well-known Spiritualist, records a case—Miss Wood being the medium—where five-and-twenty persons were present, of the little child Pocha, coming to him after a figure six feet high had just disappeared. She was very active, climbing on to his back. He satisfied himself by careful examination that she was "a child, with bow legs, and baby feet, and child's face." She got on to his back and was "say 20lb. or thereabouts in weight."

A very exhaustive series of experiments were conducted by Dr. Wolfe, to whose book I have referred before, with Mrs. Hollis. He built a cabinet in his own house, and made elaborate preparations for his experiments. Mrs. Hollis was staying in his house, and many results obtained, if accurately recorded, were extremely remarkable. The following is an example, selected from many similar ones:—

Mrs. Hollis (Wolfe, p. 449). On the 24th March, 1873, "I waited twenty minutes after the medium had entered the cabinet, when the north panel was thrown open and little Anna Hancock came to the front so as to be plainly seen from her waist up. She was beautifully dressed in colours. A few seconds after appearance, and while she still remained, another spirit stood up behind her, looking over her head. The face was more matured, but still child-like—a girl of twelve or fourteen years of age. Her hair was blonde, while Anna's was black. . . . While these two spirits were in view, a third appeared very distinctly, standing back, taller and more womanly. Her hair was tidily put up and very dark, displaying a most beautiful head, neck, and shoulders. I at once recognised Nackle Haynes, a young lady of great personal charms who was well known and beloved by a large circle of friends in this city (Cincinnati) and Mount Auburn. The three figures were beautifully materialized, standing one at the back of the other, and remained distinctly in view for ten minutes. They then began to fade, but very soon streams of magnetic light were showered upon them, when they revived. This materializing process was repeated several times before they finally melted from view."

Evidence of this nature might be multiplied indefinitely. Sufficient has been quoted to show how ponderously difficult is the ordinary explanation of the average sceptic.

THE BOSTON SPIRITUAL TEMPLE.

Our readers are already aware of the fact that Mr. Marcellus S. Ayer, of Boston, U.S.A., some two years ago bequeathed the sum of £50,000 for the erection of a Spiritual Temple for the perpetual use of Spiritualists in that city. It having been completed, a dedication service took place within its walls on September 27th, Professor Henry Kiddle, of New York, being appointed to conduct the ceremonies due to the occasion. By 6 o'clock, p.m., the large auditorium, which seats 1,500 people, was packed; the aisles and all the standing room being occupied with as fine a looking audience as ever gathered at a religious meeting in that city, numbering probably 2,000 to 2,500 persons. The platform, on which is a modest pulpit or desk, was profusely decorated with flowers. After an hour spent in organ-playing, and it being then seven o'clock, the President of the Society, Mr. S. Ayer, with Mrs. E. R. Dyer, Professor Henry Kiddle, Dr. Caswell, and Miss Peabody, ascended the platform, and the services properly commenced with music by the quartet, after which Professor Kiddle was introduced, who read an ably prepared and scholarly address occupying an hour, on the past and present of Spiritualism, which antedated history, though in its modern form it was less than forty years old. He took up the lesson of the creation of this temple, and what was expected of Spiritualism and Spiritualists. He said that a Spiritual temple must be devoted to investigation as well as to instruction. "This principle must be kept steadily in view to repress dogmatism and to encourage progress. Day by day, in this city of wealth and art and general culture, which has not inappropriately been called the Athens of America, thousands of wondering eyes have watched the beautiful temple rise higher and higher, and each individual, according to his religious training or personal prejudice, when he learnt that it meant the loathed thing called Spiritualism, has given vent to expressions of surprise or disgust." To the Spiritualist it has told the story of progress and rare promise for a movement which has had but thirty-eight years of existence." The Boston Herald, in a long descriptive article, represents the occasion as being a red-letter day for Spiritualists, and we add our congratulations to those of our American contemporary on Boston possessing a Spiritualist so devoted and so unselfish as Mr. Ayer, whose action stands pre-eminent as an example to the wealthy Spiritualists in this country to do likewise.

* Spiritualist, July 9th, 1880.

is extremely painful to think of such a work coming to an end, and of this poor woman, and these cripples being thrown imperfectly cured upon the wide world again, to lapse perhaps into a worse state than before. But natural justice imposes a limit to charity. A few people unsupported cannot continue year after year to do the work of many. The expenses of the home amount, we understand, to £8 per week, the greater part of which comes from the purse of one lady; and it is now being seriously considered whether it will not be necessary to give the work up. It is with the hope that our readers, being informed through our columns of the existence of the Cripples' Home, may be able to lend the committee assistance, that we write this account. Parcels of clothes, &c., should be addressed to Mrs. Marshall at the address already given, and pecuniary contributions to Mrs. Duncan, 17, Upper Wimpole-street, or to the Editor of "LIGHT."

"Sympneumata."

SIR,—I read "C. C. M.'s" papers on "Sympneumata," which appeared in three of your August numbers, with very great interest and admiration; but the very extent of my sympathy with them makes me the more desirous to have one particular point cleared up. The point occurs at the very opening of the first paper (pp. 369-70). Starting with a primary axiom of sensibility—that it "implies a mode of existence which must be conceived both objectively as sensible, and subjectively as sensitive"—"C. C. M." arrives, by a short passage of exposition, at the conclusion that an individual, in however "spiritual" a condition, can only affect the consciousness of other individuals through an "organism"—an objective means of expression. I agree completely with "C. C. M.'s" primary axiom, at any rate as regards any developed state of consciousness; and I agree completely with his final conclusion. My difficulty lies in the connection that he makes between the two. It seems to me that there is an identification of two relations which are really fundamentally different, though, most unfortunately, they equally admit of being represented as the relation of mind to matter, and as exhibiting the one as the "other aspect" of the other. They are:—

(A) The relation of my perception—say, of the lamp—to a corresponding change in that which makes others aware of my existence, namely, my organism; a relation only comparatively recently discovered; a relation for subsequent reflection; which has the same existence for you as for me; and which for you (in Clifford's phrase) is a relation of object to object.

(B) The relation of my perception of the lamp, quid mihi, to the lamp as perceived—the relation of me determined to that which determines me; a relation involved in the immediate act of perception; which exists for me only; and which is a relation of subject to object.

To the second of these two relations the antithesis of sensitiveness and sensible applies as a matter of logical necessity. To the first it does not so apply; for the mere fact that I am sensitive does not in itself imply that I have any means of making others aware of my existence. Thus, while it is true that my mode of existence must be conceived both objectively as sensible and subjectively as sensitive, its objective aspect is the lamp for me, not my organism for you. If "C. C. M." had spoken of a mode of existence which must be conceived objectively as sensible, and objectively (by others) as sensitive, I should, of course, agree that in such a mode of existence lies our only chance of finding ourselves in a universe peopled by fellow-creatures. Finding myself in such a universe, I accept "C. C. M.'s" account of my relation to it; but that I so find myself is an empirical fact, not a metaphysical or logical necessity. As my visual perceptions do not include my own eyes as objects for me, neither do they imply them as objects for others; and if I can conceive this, I can equally conceive myself alone or isolated in the universe, and without an organism, my existence being a series of presentations in every one of which relation B would be exhibited, while relation A would have disappeared. That is to say, my organism—my means of expression, or of becoming an object (and implying objects) to others—is involved in my existence as a member of a society; but is not involved in the fact that I myself, as subject, am sensitive to a sensible world.

But "C. C. M." goes on to define the organism in another way—or, as he would say, in another aspect—as "the mode of receptivity to, and reaction upon, impressions."

Now I do not so much complain of the application of the term "organism" to this "mode": I can imagine myself saying that I am "organic" to the lamp in the act of perceiving it; and I can understand "C. C. M." when he calls an organic constitution "a relatively fixed association of conscious states." But the identity of word must not surely be taken to imply any necessary or logical correspondence or connection between "organism" in this new sense and the "means of expression"—the objectivity to others—which was before considered. Regarded as a "mode of receptivity," the "organism" exists solely for the subject of relation B, whom we can conceive to be alone in the universe—or alone in his universe; and it implies no body, or matter, or phenomenal aspect of any sort, belonging to him. I admit that, as far as I know him, he is phenomenal. I endorse the whole view of his phenomenality, with the widest inclusion of potentialities in the way of thought-transference; merely observing, by the way, that his telepathic phenomenality must depend on the thought transferred being recognised as his thought, as the expression of him; and must be something more than a mere echo or "brain-wave." But what I fail to see is that this phenomenality of the subject is in the least implied in the admittedly necessary phenomenality of objects to the subject. If "C. C. M." replies that the subject's perception of objects in spatial relations implies his perception of himself as locally placed, I shall agree—but locally placed only as a mathematical point. His mode of receptivity—or his "organisation" if "C. C. M." likes—of visual phenomena in no way implies phenomenalisation of the ideal point (or centre of local relativities) as an "organism," an object among other objects; any more than his organisation of a set of sounds as one tone implies that he hears himself humming another. A mode of receptivity, or relation to phenomena, is not a phenomenon, however "organically" constituted. What "C. C. M." seems to have done is to derive a new (and as I think an illegitimate) subject-object antithesis from the fact that the word "organism" can be intelligibly applied to the subject of relation B, as well as to the object of relation A. But according to any natural use of language, the organism can only enter into relation B, no less than into relation A, as an object—its correlate in the one case being a subject, and in the other an object, as above set forth.

"C. C. M." may, however, take exception to these remarks in limine. He may say that, when I am contemplating the lamp, the objective aspect of my mode of existence is neither the lamp for me, nor my organism for you or for him, but the lamp's organism for me, the lamp's "means of expression," the manifestation or obverse of some psychical existence behind what I call the lamp. This would be to adopt Clifford's theory, and to endow the lamp, or its atoms, with a certain amount of embryonic (and for me effective) mind-stuff. And on this view, of course, "C. C. M." might deny the conceivability of my finding myself alone at any rate in a visible universe (personally, I could make myself happy in an audible one); since the phenomena which entered into my states of consciousness would imply the joint existence with me of a multitude of psychical entities or objects; and not the mere existence or potentiality of a multitude of objects, having no psychical existence except on the arena of a developed mind. My modesty is still such that I cannot think my being there would make any difference to these objects. I cannot feel that their existence implies in me an objective organism, that because I am sensitive to their objective side, their objective side is therefore sensitive to me—in short, that the lamp which I look at really finds me phenomenal. Still, perhaps it politely, though unconsciously, strives to do so. But at this rate, "C. C. M." should surely base his view of the necessary phenomenality of the organism directly on the mind-stuff hypothesis, which may be defended by certain complex arguments of its own; and not on the simple and necessary correlation of subject and object, which certainly does not logically involve any such hypothesis. In that case I should find that my difference from him was simply part of the old mind-stuff controversy. For instance, I should support

The organism may obviously be as truly one of the correlates in relation B as in relation A. I can consider my organism, and make it an object, just as I can make the lamp an object; though this must partly be done by representation, on account of the practical difficulties in the way of microscopically examining my own brain.

my objection to labelling "means of expression" and "mode of receptivity" with the same term, by pointing out that the receptivity appears to be at its minimum where the expression is at its maximum. The receptivity of what we call inorganic Nature must be almost nil; the little minds of its atoms have not developed even the beginning of a consciousness, as Clifford expressly admitted. "Well," it may be said, "and may not that be the very reason why inorganic matter is so dense, and gross, and inexpressive—mere dead clay?" But, in the first place, consider not clay, but free gas, or matter in its radiant form; it has tenuity and mobility enough—which are among the conditions of "C. C. M.'s" "expressiveness." And in the second place, gross seems a very ambiguous word; and though "C. C. M." draws an attractive picture of the flexible and adaptable organism that we are in time to develop, I cannot manage to carry the analogy all through Nature. Are not some of our very loftiest ideas of force and grandeur derived from dense, and heavy, and above all, stable (not fluid) things—the Weisshorn, the Pyramids, and the moon? These things are, in a sense, more expressive to me than even the best philosopher's organism—especially as for present purposes the "expression" of his profoundest thought is not his kindling eye or animated gestures, but his molecular brain-movements. However, I must not be led on into a criticism of the mind-stuff theory, not knowing as yet how far "C. C. M." considers it relevant to his argument.—I am, sir, yours obediently,

EDMUND GURNEY.

Antiquated Tyrannical Laws.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—In your issue of October 31st, you have an article advocating energetic efforts for the repeal of the "antiquated tyrannical laws," now affecting mediums in this country. I have often debated with myself whether what is not at first sight a drawback to our cause in this case is not a blessing in disguise, or, at any rate, a providential means of originating a distinctive species of Spiritualism to that prevalent in the past.

A peach-tree confined in a pot grows better or surer fruit than one luxuriating free in a fertile soil; and it is by the fact of being always tethered in their fields, that the Channel Island cattle have acquired their distinctive speciality of sending their vitality into the production of milk.

Judging from the experience of America, the effect of no check upon mediums is to encourage the production either of a breed of impostors or of a herd of immature mediums giving their services for money or notoriety, and not for love of truth. In England, thanks to our restrictive legislation, the effect is already noticeable that the public mediums who survive of home growth are only those fitted by the sincerity of their spirit for producing good spiritual fruit. It is, therefore, a matter for consideration, while public opinion is still too crude on matters spiritual to discharge its proper function of checking false or immature mediumship, whether our present unjust laws should not be allowed temporarily to discharge the above necessary function instead.

Human Characteristics of Communicating Spirits.

SIR,—Apropos of this phase of Spiritualism permit me to record a birthday greeting which my wife received this day from our spirit friends.

On birthdays, in our household, it has become a custom to give presents to one another, and it is a custom which seems to meet the approval of our invisible group as well as of those living in the flesh. Our interest in the custom has been greatly enhanced the last few years by finding, usually in the midst of these presents, direct writings from our spirit children and other friends, delightfully fragrant with the aroma of natural and celestial life. I need not say what I myself wrapped up in paper over night, and gave to my daughter to place on the breakfast table, as my present to my wife on her birthday; but on coming down to breakfast I found it, surrounded with a few other little packets of affection, at the head of the table.

When my wife opened my parcel, she found in it something which I had not put there overnight, viz., an envelope sealed up and directed in well-known spirit writing containing a sheet full of greetings from numerous spirit friends. There are letters in eight different styles of handwriting, one greeting in poetry, and the signatures, many of them well-known, of twenty different spirit friends, amongst them one from a friend who has but recently passed over, and with whose name our medium was unacquainted. No one in our household, I might safely add, nor any one person elsewhere, could have written in all the various styles of writing found on this one sheet of paper, nor could the greetings be found "in current literature." They are too personal to transcribe, or I should like your readers to enjoy as we do these homelike, and more than human, characteristics of communicating spirits.

One of the children, in the midst of a charming child's epistle, writes: "We love you very dearly, and should like to give you kisses, so you could feel them, but as we may not do that yet we will give you a nice cup of tea," &c., &c. And when Mary and my daughter came downstairs this morning they found the kitchen fire alight, although it had not even been laid overnight, also the gas stove alight, with kettles, which were left empty overnight, now filled and sweetly singing! Shortly after the tea was made by this child-spirit, and the cup of tea promised to mamma was ready.

Very human characteristics! and very acceptable help, for which we have been grateful daily now for over two years.

Yours faithfully,

October 29th, 1885.

The Doctrine of Shells.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Kindly allow me to guard against an inference which might be drawn from the Hon. Roden Noel's courteous reference to my view of a certain class of psychic phenomena. It might appear from his interesting paper on "Spiritism versus Other Theories" ("LIGHT," October 31st), that the "doctrine of shells" (an unfortunate phrase), found in the writings of some members of the Theosophical Society, is really "a protest" of any views I have expressed. The substance of that doctrine as contained in "Esoteric Buddhism" originally appeared in the Theosophist magazine (see Vol. III.) before the commencement of my connection with the Theosophical Society, or any of its members. And I might also add that opinions, having the same bearing, are to be found even in the earlier writings of Colonel Olcott and Madame Blavatsky. It will thus be seen that, chronologically speaking, my views had no influence of any kind on "Esoteric Buddhism."—I am, sir, your obedient servant,

A Query.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—A late writer in your columns quotes the following as from Shakespeare:—

"I gazed within the jaws of death, and saw life teeming."

I cannot find the passage in the concordance, and would be grateful to anyone who would send to you the references for publication.—Yours respectfully,

September 29th, 1885.

In the course of a long article, descriptive of the spread of Spiritualism in Russia, the New York Tribune says: "Strange to say, it is in this country (Russia), that Spiritualism as a development of the science of psychology has found its most earnest interpreters, and it is in St. Petersburg and Moscow that these curious manifestations have attracted and interested such men as Professor Boutlerof, of European celebrity, and Professor Wagner, both attached to the Petersburg University; the Russian avant, Mr. Alexander Aksakof, Professor Tourkevitch, Dr. Basil Mihailoff, and many more distinguished men of science and letters, such as Dostoensky, Solovieff, and Dimitri Tseretoff. Having found hospitality in such an exalted circle, Spiritualism ceased to be an amusement for the drawing-room idlers and became a problem with pretensions to a scientific solution. The public was lost in amazement at first to behold three scientific stars of capital magnitude pay the most concentrated and serious attention to this question in its modern form. . . . Both Mr. Boutlerof and Mr. Wagner had previously been declared enemies of this movement, and the most inveterate materialists withal, so that at first they were supposed by their colleagues at the University and by the students to have gone out of their minds. . . . Russia now possesses a considerable literature on the subject which totally differs from productions of the same kind abroad, inasmuch as these articles are stamped with a spirit of genuine scientific research, and present the subject in quite a new light."

THE EMPIRICAL METHOD.

Acknowledged facts settle all disputes respecting the possible and the impossible. All affirmations respecting the impossibility of certain phenomena are shattered by the presentation of the phenomena themselves. The possibility of analysing the constituents of the sun and stars, of instantaneously conveying signs indicative of thought through the unfathomed wastes of the Atlantic Ocean, the power of reproducing sounds by magnetic currents at the distance of half the diameter of the earth, are facts of daily occurrence, and yet not more than half a century ago, they would have been classed among events absolutely impossible.

Scientific limitations have, during the present century, been so often shattered, that sanguine and open minds are liable to suppose dogmatic a priori limitations things of the past.

Little experience in the promulgation of new truths is requisite to prove that conservative immobility is firmly fixed in the minds of the majority of men, and notwithstanding the numerous experiences of the present century in extending the recognised bounds of the possible, there are those who think it becoming, apart from experiments, to dogmatise respecting phenomenal limitations.

The fact is undoubted that some alleged phenomena appear more probable than do others, but it is equally certain, in view of accomplished facts, that it is unbecoming absolutely to reject without examination, alleged facts, no matter how antecedently improbable, that are vouched for by hundreds of competent and credible witnesses, who have devoted years to their careful investigation, and who, notwithstanding adverse prepossessions, affirm their reality and genuineness.

The majority of scientific men who have entered upon the investigation of the phenomena of Modern Spiritualism have done so for the purpose of endeavouring to prove them illusions, and without a solitary exception, all who have fully examined them have acknowledged their genuineness. There have been diversities of opinion as to the laws by which they are produced, but an absolute consensus of opinion as to the facts themselves. If this affirmation be true, where is the justification on the part of scientific men for refusing to examine them? A priori denial of the alleged phenomena, in view of the cumulative evidence of well-accredited witnesses for nearly half a century, is childish absurd, and indicates a bigotry, a prejudice, or a terror that ill becomes men claiming to be scientific.

In all moot questions except this, men of science recommend and adopt the empirical method where experiments are practicable, but singular to relate, in this exceptional case they persistently refuse to examine, and go so far as to assert, without the shadow of experience, that the alleged facts are impossible. Darwin, Huxley, Tyndall, Dallinger, Pasteur, Haeckel, have all won their laurels by closely following the empirical groove, and now they shun it as though it were a pestilence. Darwin sought to demonstrate his propositions by training pigeons, dogs, and plants, Huxley by protoplasmic researches, Tyndall by exhaustive experiments on sterilised fluids, Dallinger by his epoch-making investigations into the lives of monads, Pasteur by his numerous biological experiments, and Haeckel by the close scrutiny of embryological forms—experiments everywhere and always except on this most momentous of all researches—viz., the penetration of what appear to be extra mundane laws and forces into the mundane sphere. These occult, and apparently abnormal phenomena, are amenable to the same laws of observation as are those which have come under the examination of the scientists just enumerated, they appeal to the same five senses, they lend themselves to similar conditions, and the main aspect in which they differ is that the agents appear to be independent intelligences, having a control of matter which we do not yet possess, and whose actions may be studied, but cannot with our present knowledge be equalled or controlled.

Purely physical mundane phenomena may be repeated indefinitely and absolutely, but psychological phenomena have within themselves the elements of independent volition, and may be observed, but not successfully commanded.

We may, for example, endeavour to induce Professor Tyndall to continue or re-exhibit his experiments, but we cannot command him, or, at least, he may refuse to obey. So it is in those occult phenomena in the production of which independent intelligence is manifested; we may request but certainly cannot command.

The agents, whoever or whatever they are, are amenable to the ordinary laws of courtesy, and if courteously requested generally comply, of course within their limitations, as they, like ourselves, can only give that information and perform those acts that are within the range of their knowledge and power. Some sciolists appear to believe that if the agents are spirits they know everything and can do anything, but that childish superstition is speedily overthrown, and they are found to be under the limitations that enclose every finite creature.

THE Banner of Light has just completed its fifty-ninth volume, having been established twenty-nine years.

A NEW volume has just been published by the Countess Adeline von Vay, entitled "Dem Zephyr Abgelesen."

THE rapid spread of Spiritualism in North Queensland and in Greytown, New Zealand, is causing great excitement in the various Australasian Colonies.

MRS. ANDERSON, who recently accompanied Mrs. Williams, the New York medium, to this country, has published a volume of experiences entitled "Clear Light from the Spirit-world."

A TRANSLATION of a pamphlet on "Spiritism," by the celebrated German philosopher, E. von Hartmann (author of "The Philosophy of the Unconscious," &c.), is just about to be issued by the Psychological Press Association. The author is strongly opposed to the Spiritist explanation of the alleged phenomena, by the evidence for which, as facts, he is nevertheless so strongly impressed as to urge investigation by State-appointed commissions! Most of the facts relied on by Spiritists are passed in review, and explanations, partly psychological, partly metaphysical, are suggested. So good a synopsis of the alleged marvels, and of the evidence for them, is nowhere else to be found in so small a compass. There is a preface by the translator, who criticises the author's conclusions rather freely; and though not quite a Spiritist pur sang, thinks that a belief in spirits, cleared from many misconceptions, will recover its place in the culture of the future.

PROCEEDINGS AT A HAUNTED HOUSE AT W—.

June 6th-8th, 1885.

On the evening of June 6th, 1885, a party of eight gentlemen, including Mr. W. Eglinton, the medium, and Mr. J. S. Farmer, a well-known Spiritualist, arrived at W—. Their main object was to pass a night or two in a house which was declared, on the exceptionally trustworthy evidence of successive occupiers, to be haunted.

There has been (it was understood) much scientific investigation of haunted houses of late years, but with little or no result. It was thought, therefore, that as the things heard and seen by the occupiers and others in haunted houses are apparently related to the things heard and seen at Spiritualistic sittings, it would be both novel and interesting to observe if any better success could be obtained in the presence of a medium. Mr. Eglinton, on being taken into consultation on the subject, expressed himself as also interested in what might happen at W—, and kindly offered his services in a non-professional capacity.

As the rest of the party had comparatively little experience in the methods of Spiritualism, Mr. Farmer was also asked to assist, and obligingly accepted the invitation. [Note by Mr. Leonard.—Several members of the party were just then in friendly treaty with Mr. Eglinton for a series of sittings. They gladly took this opportunity of making the acquaintance of Mr. Eglinton, and of entering into those mutual cordial relations with him so necessary, as they had heard, to the attainment of good results generally at his sittings.] Three sittings were held: two upon the nights of the 6th-7th of June, and one upon the night of the 7th-8th June. Of the incidents occurring at these sittings the investigators confine themselves to a dry record.

The house is small, containing on the ground-floor a drawing-room and a dining-room to the right and left of the hall respectively. On the same floor at the back of the house are two kitchens, scullery, &c. On the left and connected by a door from the second kitchen, is a large empty barn. Beneath the house are spacious cellars. On the first floor are three bedrooms and a dressing-room; on the second floor are three bedrooms. Phantoms are reported to have been seen, or mysterious noises heard, in every room in the house.

For convenience sake it was determined to hold the first sitting in the drawing-room. The house was carefully examined, and the doors of the bedrooms, as well as the front and back doors, were locked. About midnight on Saturday (June 6th) a circle was formed round the table. A china candlestick was placed in the middle of the table and the light blown out. The room was then in complete darkness. The sitters joined hands, and about an hour was spent in conversation, varied occasionally by a song from one or other of the sitters.

During this time the positions of the sitters were, by way of experiment, changed three or four times as Mr. Eglinton suggested, [and others also, myself among the number.—J.S.F.] the final positions being those indicated in Diagram 1.

DIAGRAM 1.

A fact must here be noted, as a discussion has arisen about it in the columns of "LIGHT." It will be best to quote Mr. Farmer's own words on the subject, in "LIGHT" of September 19th, 1885: "On each occasion, mainly for reasons obvious to experienced investigators, I occupied a seat next to the medium, two other members of the party also alternately filling the corresponding position." [Note by Mr. Farmer.—It was obviously a very necessary precaution, as we were all about to enter a terra incognita, that I, as the most experienced of the party, should be near Mr. Eglinton in order to be able to take prompt action in any untoward emergency. As far as I could judge all present recognised these "obvious reasons," and agreed in my (somewhat unwillingly, by the way) yielding to them.] But beyond this insertion of a correct statement, from the best source, of the fact itself, it is unnecessary to introduce the discussion into this report.

About 12.45 Major J. felt a slight blow upon his foot. Shortly afterwards there was a slight tap, apparently on some part of the table. Mr. Eglinton thought that this might have been due to his locket striking against the table, but as he had not moved he said nothing at the time. Very little notice was taken of either of these occurrences.

About 1.15 a.m. Mr. Eglinton said he felt a presence behind him whose influence was of the most disagreeable nature, and which he deemed to be a spirit of a very malignant type. Very shortly afterwards Mr. L. stated that he had received a blow upon the crown of his head. The blow was heard by several of those present. Almost immediately afterwards Mr. Eglinton, in a voice of some suffering, complained that he also had received a severe blow on the head. The sound of the blow was audible to all present, and Mr. Eglinton seemed to become much agitated. Immediately Mr. T. received a blow on his left ear, causing it to tingle, and the blow descended on to his left shoulder. Instantly afterwards all present heard the sound as of a violent blow on Mr. Eglinton's head, and that of the fall of a heavy body, apparently between Mr. T. and Major H. This was instantly followed by a loud crash of glass from the direction of the sideboard, which caused so lively a sense of something worse impending that a light was immediately struck.

Upon examination, the candlestick, which had been in the centre of the table when the light was extinguished, was found among the glasses on the sideboard, several of which were broken apparently by the force of the concussion. A stout oak walking-stick which, at the commencement of the sitting, had been leaning in the corner of the room (A), was found on the floor (B), on the other side of the table.

Each member of the circle now testified that throughout he had firmly held each of his neighbours by the hand. It may be here said that the incidents just recounted, from the time Mr. L. was struck on the head until a light was procured, did not altogether occupy more than three minutes.

After an examination of the damage done, the sitting was resumed; a lighted candle being placed (at Mr. Farmer's suggestion) in the hall, and the door being left ajar, so that the room was dimly lighted. Mr. Eglinton showed signs of great nervousness and depression. Raps were then heard on the floor near him. These professed to proceed from the medium's "spirit-guide," "Joey." In answer to questions put by Mr. Farmer the raps declared that the house was haunted by a man and also by a woman. Slight sounds which appeared to proceed from the bedroom overhead were now heard. It must be stated that the windows throughout the house rattled considerably. These sounds, nevertheless, were said by those who more particularly noticed them to be unlike the rattling of windows. Mr. Eglinton exhibited signs of increased depression, and the sitting was adjourned (about 1.45 a.m.).

The dining-room upon the opposite side of the passage, a room more barely finished, was now, by general consent, cleared of the few things it contained except chairs, sofa, table and the fender, which, from its weight (26½lb.) was considered a fixture. Within ten minutes after resuming the sitting (about 2.45 a.m.), which was held in total darkness, raps were heard on the floor near Mr. Eglinton. These indicated that "Joey," one of Mr. Eglinton's "spirit-guides," was again present. [Note by Mr. Farmer.—We sat in the dark again much against my will and advice. After our first experience in the drawing-room, I, at this and the subsequent sittings, spoke strongly against the condition of darkness. Mr. Eglinton expressed no opinion; but the others present thinking the phenomena might be more marked if we sat in total darkness, my objection was overruled.—J.S.F.]

Mr. Eglinton complained that Mr. D., the sitter on his right, seemed to draw too much vitality from him; and eventually, owing to the imperative desire expressed by the raps, the sitters took the positions round the table as shown in Diagram 2. [Note by Mr. Eglinton.—The raps never at any time arranged the sitters. On the contrary, after I had made this remark, various members of the circle suggested that F. should again place himself near me.—W. E.]

DIAGRAM 2.

Questions were addressed, and in reply raps repeated the previous statement, that the house was haunted by a man and a woman. While Mr. Farmer was asking whether by continued sitting any benefit would accrue to these "earth-bound spirits," in quick succession a loud crash of glass upon the wall (at P) was heard, and some large, heavy object descended with a crash upon the table, causing a slight scalp-wound upon the head of one sitter and grazing the hands of two others. The circle at once broke up, the door being immediately opened and light brought in. It was then found that the crash of glass had been apparently due to the violent contact of a tumbler with the wall at the point (P). The bottom of the broken tumbler was found in the corner of the room, and many splinters of glass were found sticking in the plaster upon that side of the dent nearest to the window. The room had been carefully cleared of glasses before the sitting. The heavy object which had descended upon the table was found to be the iron fender, which had been immediately behind Messrs. Eglinton and Farmer and Major H., and was now upside down upon the table. The table was deeply indented by one corner of the fender. The attention of the sitters, whether or no disturbed by the preceding incident, was not attracted by any audible indication from the movements of the fender. The hands of the three gentlemen nearest to the fender (and this is especially noteworthy) were clean, whereas all those who had been touched by it in its fall, or had subsequently handled it, were soiled by the black-lead upon it.

It was now testified by all that throughout the sitting the contact of hands had been firmly maintained. The sitting was adjourned at Mr. Farmer's request; he saying that he knew Mr. Eglinton to be in a very nervous condition, and that he was likely to suffer if any further violent manifestations took place.

About 11 p.m. on Sunday another sitting was commenced in the dining-room, everything having been removed except the table, chairs, and the sofa, which last was tied by a rope to the bars of the fire-grate. The party resumed the positions in which they had sat last, except that Mr. D. transferred his seat to the left hand of Mr. L.

Mr. Eglinton stated at first that the "influence" was good. Raps were heard upon the floor, and these purported to be produced by "Joey," one of Mr. Eglinton's "controls." They stated, in answer to questions, that he ("Joey") had been over-mastered on the preceding night by the spirit haunting the house; that the circle incurred considerable danger by sitting in the dark, as the manifestations would probably be violent, the spirit having a particular antipathy to one person present; but that he ("Joey") would try to protect the circle from harm. Very shortly afterwards Mr. Eglinton said that he felt a complete change in his feelings, a return of the evil influence of the previous night, accompanied by very unpleasant sensations of a Presence. Mr. Farmer, Mr. L., and Mr. D. also stated that they experienced peculiar sensations. They had scarcely made these statements when there was heard a slight rustling sound, which we afterwards judged to be that of falling mortar, in the direction of the fire-place. This was followed by a confused sound, which gave the impression that Messrs. Farmer and Eglinton, seated on the sofa, were struggling with something unseen. The door was opened, and the light let in. Both Messrs. Eglinton and Farmer appeared overwhelmed with horror, and the upright slab of the mantel-piece (weighing 14½ lb.) on the left hand-side was seen to be detached, and was lying on the sofa behind them. It appeared from a deep dent in Mr. Farmer's hat that the slab had first been raised and dropped on to his head, whence it had fallen over Mr. Eglinton's back on to the sofa.

Messrs. Eglinton and Farmer have themselves furnished some observations upon what took place, which it is as well here to insert. Mr. Eglinton says: "I was not struggling, nor was Farmer to the best of my belief. I was conscious of the Presence; and bent down under Farmer to escape impending danger. The slab came immediately after I had done so."

Mr. Farmer says: "I was not struggling. The noise as of scuffling arose from the fact that Mr. Eglinton was crouching under me and on my lap, as if to seek protection. I had already been forcibly struck upon my head from above, the blow falling on my hat. After striking my head, the substance fell on to my shoulder, and thence descended to the sofa at the back." And further he continues: "After the experience of the previous night, I, to be prepared for any emergency, had kept in my hand a single wax match; and after I had been struck, and while Mr. Eglinton was crouching down under me, I disengaged my right hand from the left hand of Mr. W., and immediately struck a light." It may here be mentioned that several members of the circle, after the events of the preceding sitting, had thought it best to wear their hats.

Both Messrs. Farmer and Eglinton absolutely refused to sit again, as they could not tell what might happen. The overpowering sensation of some terrible presence was an experience which they could not consent to go through again. And most of the circle seemed disposed to agree that the manifestations had been amply sufficient. Two members of the circle, however (Mr. D. and Major H.) sat by themselves in the dining-room for forty minutes in complete darkness. Beyond the fall of some mortar into the fireplace, nothing occurred.

All facts having any relation to this separation of the slab, whatever bearing they may severally have, must be mentioned. The slab was examined shortly after the final sitting and no marks were discovered upon it, or upon the parts from which it had been detached. The corresponding slab it was impossible to unfix by the hands alone, though the next morning, in the presence of three members only, a workman who was called in to repair the damage, took it off with his chisel, leaving no marks on the slab. He remarked that these slabs sometimes came off by themselves owing to the drying of the cement. The slab was, however, secure on the Sunday morning.

[Final Note by Mr. Eglinton.—It should be distinctly understood that at none of these sittings did I experience any of the ordinary sensations attending mediumship, except during the period when I was questioning the rappings which purported to be produced by one of my "controls."]

Signed on behalf of the circle,

A. G. LEONARD.

We have received a copy of the general programme of the proceedings of the London Lodge of the Theosophical Society for the session 1885-6. General meetings of the lodge will be held at Queen Anne's Mansions, St. James's Park, on the fourth Wednesday in every month. Members are at liberty to bring friends, unless special notice is given to the contrary. The "Oriental Group" formed within the Society for the study of Esoteric Philosophy will meet on the second Wednesday in every month. Further information as to the constitution of this group can be obtained from Mr. J. Varley, 5, Grattan-road, West Kensington. During the session Mr. Sinnett will deliver a course of lectures on the Esoteric Philosophy at Queen Anne's Mansions. Of these further notice will be given. Meetings will be held at 77, Elgin-crescent, Notting Hill, on the third Wednesday in each month for the study of the Bhagavatgita, with the assistance of Mr. Mohini, and, subject to other arrangements to be made from time to time, these meetings will be held on the first Wednesday also. These meetings are open to all members of the Society, but to members only. The first general meeting, at Queen Anne's Mansions, was held on Wednesday, October 28th, at 9 p.m., at the Garden Mansion, when Mr. Sinnett delivered an address. The first meeting of the Oriental Group will be held on Wednesday, November 11th. The first meeting for the study of the Bhagavatgita will be held on Wednesday, November 18th, at 9 p.m.

SPIRITISM VERSUS OTHER THEORIES.

BY THE HON. RODEN NOEL.

Mr. Gurney speaks indeed of a consciousness "unappropriated," "belonging to no continuous stream of consciousness" (Proceedings, December, 1884); but none can be really unappropriated. Even a feeling, and a fortiori a percept, or idea involves some attention, though the main attention may be directed elsewhere, which may cause the faint feeling or notion to be soon forgotten. But if I feel at all, I must feel thus or thus, and if I perceive, I must perceive so and so, which means I must discriminate the feeling or thing by bringing it into one implicitly (if not explicitly) identified current of consciousness, that it may be implicitly compared with remembered, or simultaneous items of experience. And that involves one conscious comparing Ego implicitly felt to be the same yesterday and to-day; else the process would be impossible. So that the percept, however faint, is always liable to be re-appropriated at its own proper moment. For self-consciousness in reflection is but the precipitate of elements latent from the first in the mental solution of simple consciousness.

Thus in the very interesting experiments of Richet, detailed in the same article, where Richet was the suggesting "spirit," or one of them, the conditions of a séance, according to what we Spiritists believe, were exactly reproduced, except that Richet was an embodied spirit, and usually the spirit is not in the flesh. There was a medium tilting a table at the right moment, and a planchette. However, the earlier experiments suggest a disembodied intelligence besides, and, I suspect, the later ones also, if the name transmitted to the medium was not merely sub-conscious in M. Richet's mind, but at the moment out of it; unless, indeed, it was "telepathically" transferred to that of some other embodied person present. The point is, however, that not the name he intended, but another that had been only sub-conscious in his mind, was reproduced by the medium.

The whole continuous succession of our actual time-consciousness (if taken in its entirety, and multiplicity of development in many phases, perhaps in many lives, worlds, or spheres) is, in my belief, no other than our transcendent consciousness, only viewed from the imperfect, limited, and temporary standpoint of our present defective (and, therefore, so far illusory) life. If we saw and felt truly our own life, the time-element would be absorbed by being fulfilled, changed in form, virtually, therefore, disappear, and "be no more." But how does it follow from this idea that, if you posit another different conscious succession, simultaneous with the one conscious succession that, by its very oneness in variety, constitutes an individuality as we know it now, you yet do not have two individualities, but still only one? This does not follow at all! While we are living and conceiving under the form of time, simultaneity of distinct consciousness (pace Mr. Gurney, Mr. Massey, and Dr. von Hartmann) must always signify two individuals, not one. It were easy indeed to conceive of eternity, if that only meant placing a number of successive temporary consciousnesses side by side in simultaneous times!! But that would not advance us much, I imagine! for so we should not transcend time, but simply reduce it to a confused absurdity. For my own part, I can make little of this two-headed-monster theory.

What surprises me most is that a thinker like "C. C. M." should entertain this hypothesis when he has uttered such excellent and weighty words as these in his essay on "Symptomata": "As long as the human individual is isolated" (italics mine), "he cannot realise and wield the psychical forces which belong to essential humanity. But when the unity of the race is a living fact for every member of it, the vast reserves of force can be drawn to any point where they are needed, and the individual suit of armour (our present solid organism) can be discarded. We have heard some complaints lately that telepathic psychology is being pressed too far. It is destined to be enormously extended. The human race is one inchoate organism, the internal rapports of which are only as yet apparent between its more intimately associated members. The individual sympathies, mediating thought, and sensational transference are only an early and special case of the great human rapport, which will come to observation with every advance of the unitary consciousness." Excellent! And yet when the phenomena of Spiritism seem to extend indefinitely the evidence of such intimate relations between all the individual members of the great universal family of intelligences, unseen as well as seen, "C. C. M." prefers attributing them rather to a purely hypothetical, and scarcely conceivable (indeed, as I have shown, a self-contradictory) self-sundering of one and the same individual! Nor, indeed, can I at all follow him when he says in the same essay: "For, as the normal Ego knows nothing of the transcendental subject, any entrance of the latter into its consciousness is as that of a stranger. In the day-dream or somnambulant consciousness the transcendental subject steps forth as a second personality." "Hence the guides and guardians of somnambules and mediums." "The emergence of the transcendental subject above the threshold, who then of course speaks as, and is inevitably accounted, a guardian or control." In the name of all that is veracious, why? What can possibly warrant so questionable an assertion? In the first place it would seem as if "C. C. M." must attach a meaning to the phrase "transcendental subject" which I should have been, on other accounts, the last to attribute to him, for he speaks of the "somnambulant or transcendental functions." I fail entirely to see why the somnambulant should be more "transcendental" than the normal or waking functions, precisely as I fail to see why Spiritists attribute some peculiar spiritual virtue to what they (not very prettily) call a "fluidic" body; the result being that if only the religious doctrine taught, or information imparted, is imparted to them by some intelligence with a "fluidic" body, they seem to jump at it as if it came from the Divine Being Himself, and necessarily superseded all former revelations. But a fluidic body, as Mr. Maitland has pointed out, may be as much the appanage of a demon, or an imp, as of an angel! I think of the two I rather prefer a solid to a fluidic body, as I frequently prefer the kindly common-sense of ordinary daylight to the frothy rhapsodies of some crepuscular somnambulism.

"C. C. M." says that even the somnambulism induced by disease often "mediates an exalted moral consciousness and intelligence such as may not be apparent in the merely personal character." No doubt that is quite true. But then he goes on to say that this is necessarily accounted a "guardian," or "control." Why so? If it belongs indeed to the same Ego, or self, I quite fail to see why it should be so mistaken. Most of us are conscious of higher or lower moods, of affinities with hell and heaven, while now one affinity, now another, emerges into prominence of relief and domination. But such an inspiration as that referred to, if indeed it be attributed to another, and higher, is more probably what intuition discerns, the inflowing of the Holy Spirit, which, while we are still earth-bound, is rather primarily the influence of more elevated and advanced souls, or angels, than that of our own holier consciousness, though assuredly this also may be aroused into momentary glow and fervour by their exalted ministration. For spirits in their essential being are in most intimate communion; yea, free of one another for purposes of mutual help and love.

Though I admit the transcendent subject (and fail, by the way, to see how one who does so can disbelieve in our essential immortality, and hold instead our ultimate absorption into a non-individuality, more absolute than that of love, knowledge, and sympathy), I think those who believe in it, as a rule, perhaps too much seer the two spheres of time and eternity. There are not two subjects in one, a temporal, and an eternal; far less are there several simultaneous subjects in one, which last idea is a far more gratuitous paradox. But the temporal, continuous succession (be it normal, or abnormal) is the transcendent and eternal—only imperfectly grasped, experienced, lived. Assuredly the higher, richer, more spiritual, less self-centred, the more righteous and loving are we, the more we enter into our true individuality. But that, so far from being the emergence of a different self, is the perfecting and fulfilment of the same, enabling us the more profoundly to realise our identity, our essential being through and in one another.

Light in the West is the title of still another newspaper started in the interests of Spiritualism in America.

As showing the rapid spread of Spiritualism in the provinces during recent years, it may be interesting to state that at recent Sunday services, held at Blackburn, the attendance numbered 1,000 in the morning, and over 1,200 in the evening.

Will "Cam" and "W. G.," who recorded certain narratives in "LIGHT" for October 3rd and 10th, kindly communicate with E. Gurney, Esq., Sec. of the Society for Psychical Research, 14, Dean's-yard, S.W. He wishes to communicate with them in reference to these special cases.

THE SOCIETY FOR PSYCHICAL RESEARCH.

Ageneral meeting of this Society was held on Thursday, October 29th, at the Garden Mansion, Queen Anne's Mansions, London, S.W. The President of the Society, Professor Balfour Stewart, F.R.S., took the chair at 8.30 p.m. The meeting, which was partly of a conversational character, was open to members and associates. In the course of the evening a paper was read by Frederic W. H. Myers, Esq., on "Human Personality in the Light of Recent Hypnotic Experiments." Mr. Myers began by explaining the general position he was about to take up in the controversy now going on as to the true nature of man. The old view, he said, held both by ordinary common-sense and by most metaphysicians, maintains that each of us possesses a distinct and permanent personality, a self which is a unity, and not a mere aggregation. This view is usually based on introspection. The new physiological view, on the other hand, is to the effect that the only unity in us is the unity of our organism, and that our sense of personality depends merely on the temporary harmony of a sufficient number of the physical elements which compose us. This view is supported by physiological analysis. The lecturer advocated the methods of the new school, but he was led by them to something more like the conclusions of the older. The old empirical conception of human personality must be analysed into its constituent elements before the basis of a scientific doctrine of human personality could safely be laid. He proceeded to give an account of various experiments on hypnotised subjects, partly made by the Society for Psychical Research, 14, Dean's Yard, S.W., but mainly by certain French séances. From these it appears that if a favourable subject was hypnotised, and a suggestion made to him in the hypnotic trance, in his waking life he will do what he has been told to do, yet will all the while suppose that he is acting on his own impulse. It was thus shown that our sense of free will may often be illusory. The lecturer then touched on the phenomena of alternating memory, which hypnotism evokes. The subject acquires, it seems, a second memory, distinct from the first, and including the things said and done in the trance condition, which are entirely forgotten in ordinary waking life. Thus we can hardly appeal to the continuity of our memory as a proof of a persistent personality. After pointing out the dangers involved in hypnotism, and the safeguards against them, the lecturer gave some remarkable examples of improvement of character effected by hypnotic suggestion. Habits of over-indulgence in beer, spirits, coffee, and smoking, have been effectually checked by throwing the subject into the hypnotic trance, and suggesting to him that on his awaking he would find that he disliked beer, &c. The lecturer was of opinion that this power of suggestion might be turned to great practical advantage. Returning to his opening statement of opinion, he pointed out that this process of analysing human faculties by direct experiment, though in some directions it led to conclusions at which our self-esteem might revolt, yet was beginning to discover in us the germs of faculties transcending any which we were previously aware of possessing. Such a faculty was telepathy, or the transmission of thought and sensation from one mind to another, without the agency of the recognised organs of sense. This discovery afforded reasonable grounds for hope that we might hereafter establish on a valid scientific basis much that had hitherto been the object only of trust and aspiration.

Mrs. HARDINGE BRITTON has been addressing crowded audiences in Newcastle.

A NEW Spiritualist Society has been started in Marylebone, and meetings are held at Nutford Hall, Nutford-place. Mr. F. W. Read is the secretary.

Mr. A. THORPE wishes to form a private circle in Chatham for the purpose of investigation. He should be addressed at 10, King William-street, London, E.C.

We were not favoured with a call from Mrs. Mellon, the medium, during her stay in London. She is announced to give sances in Burnley and Southport, but we trust for her own sake she will not do so to promiscuous gatherings.

We hear of extraordinary activity of Spiritualists in Croydon, and of many private mediums being developed. In one case it is stated a lady frequently floats in the air over the heads of the sitters, as Mr. Home used to do many years ago. Perhaps our friends in that district will favour us with their experiences.

TENNYSON'S NEW POEM ON "VASTNESS."

Although the Poet Laureate's last poem, published in this month's Macmillan's, has been copied in extenso into many journals, yet as many of our readers may not have seen it we quote it here. Those who "can read between the lines" will trace many touches of Tennyson's avowed faith as a Spiritualist—the last stanza especially being singularly clear and expressive.

"Many a hearth upon our dark globe sighs after many a vanish'd face, Many a planet by many a sun may roll with the dust of a vanish'd race."

"Raving politics, never at rest—as this poor earth's pale history runs,
What is it all but a trouble of ants in the gleam of a million million of suns?"

"Lies upon this side, lies upon that side, truthless violence mourn'd by the Wise,
Thousands of voices drowning his own in a popular torrent of lies upon lies!"

"Stately purposes, valour in battle, glorious annals of army and fleet, Death for the right cause, death for the wrong cause, trumpets of victory, groans of defeat;"

"Innocence seethed in her mother's milk, and Charity setting the martyr aflame; Thraldom who walks with the banner of Freedom, and reeks not to ruin a realm in her name."

"Faith at her zenith, or all but lost in the gloom of doubts that darken these schools; Craft with a bunch of all-heal in her hand, follow'd up by her vassal legion of fools;"

"Pain, that has crawl'd from the corpse of Pleasure, a worm which writhes all day, and at night Stirs up again in the heart of the sleeper, and stings him back to the curse of the light;"

"Wealth with his wines and his wedded harlots; Flattery gilding the rift of a throne; Opulent Avarice, lean as Poverty; honest Poverty, bare to the bone;"

"Love for the maiden crown'd with marriage, no regrets for aught that has been, Household happiness, gracious children, debtless competence, golden mean;"

"National hatreds of whole generations, and pigmy spite of the village spire; Vows that will last to the last death-ruckle, and vows that are snapt in a moment of fire;"

"He that has lived for the lust of the minute, and died in the doing it, flesh without mind;
He that has nail'd all flesh to the Cross, till Self died out in the love of his kind;"

"Spring and Summer, and Autumn and Winter, and all these old revolutions of earth;
All new-old revolutions of Empire—change of the tide—what is all of it worth?"

"What the philosophies, all the sciences, poesy, varying voices of prayer;
All that is noblest, all that is basest, all that is filthy with all that is fair?"

"What is it all, if we all of us end but in being our own corpse-collins at last, Swallow'd in Vastness, lost in Silence, drown'd in the deeps of a meaningless Past?"

"What but a murmur of gnats in the gloom, or a moment's anger of bees in their hive?"

Peace, let it be! for I loved him, and love him for ever: the dead are not dead, but alive."

Dr. JAMES R. NICHOLS, of the Popular Science News, in commenting upon the growing interest in psychical research, says that among men of learning, and through protracted observations, the belief prevails that "there is, beyond the possibility of a doubt, a source of intelligence quite outside of human origination or interference."

Mr. W. EGLINTON'S CONTINENTAL TOUR.—We understand that Mr. Eglinton has received an invitation to give sances to distinguished persons in Moscow and Finland, and he will also visit Hungary and Austria early next year. We are desired by Mr. Eglinton to say that all invitations to pay a visit to any part of Europe should reach him not later than the end of November.

WHAT IS SAID OF PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

J. H. FICHTE, THE GERMAN PHILOSOPHER AND AUTHOR.—"Notwithstanding my age (83) and my exemption from the controversies of the day, I feel it my duty to bear testimony to the great fact of Spiritualism. No one should keep silent."

PROFESSOR DE MORGAN, PRESIDENT OF THE MATHEMATICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.—"I am perfectly convinced that I have both seen and heard, in a manner which should make unbelief impossible, things called spiritual, which cannot be taken by a rational being to be capable of explanation by imposture, coincidence, or mistake. So far I feel the ground firm under me."

Dr. ROBERT CHAMBERS.—"I have for many years known that these phenomena are real, as distinguished from impostures; and it is not of yesterday that I concluded they were calculated to explain much that has been doubtful in the past; and, when fully accepted, revolutionise the whole frame of human opinion on many important matters."—Extract from a Letter to A. Russell Wallace.

PROFESSOR HARE, EMERITUS PROFESSOR OF CHEMISTRY IN THE UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA.—"Far from abating my confidence in the inferences respecting the agencies of the spirits of deceased mortals, in the manifestations of which I have given an account in my work, I have, within the last nine months" (this was written in 1858), "had more striking evidences of that agency than those given in the work in question."

PROFESSOR CHALLIS, THE LATE PLUMERIAN PROFESSOR OF ASTRONOMY AT CAMBRIDGE.—"I have been unable to resist the large amount of testimony to such facts, which has come from many independent sources, and from a vast number of witnesses. . . . In short, the testimony has been so abundant and contentaneous, that either the facts must be admitted to be such as are reported, or the possibility of certifying facts by human testimony must be given up."—Clerical Journal, June, 1862.

PROFESSOR GREGORY, F.R.S.E.—"The essential question is this, What are the proofs of the agency of departed spirits? Although I cannot say that I yet feel the sure and firm conviction on this point which I feel on some others, I am bound to say that the higher phenomena, recorded by so many truthful and honourable men, appear to me to render the spiritual hypothesis almost certain. . . . I believe that if I could myself see the higher phenomena alluded to I should be satisfied, as are all those who have had the best means of judging of the truth of the spiritual theory."

LORD BROUGHAM.—"There is but one question I would ask the author, Is the Spiritualism of this work foreign to our materialistic, manufacturing age? No; for amidst the varieties of mind which divers circumstances produce are found those who cultivate man's highest faculties; to these the author addresses himself. But even in the most cloudless skies of scepticism I see a rain-cloud, if it be no bigger than a man's hand; it is modern Spiritualism."—Preface by Lord Brougham to "The Book of Nature," By C. O. Groom Napier, F.C.S.

THE LONDON DIALECTICAL COMMITTEE reported: "1. That sounds of a very varied character, apparently proceeding from articles of furniture, the floor and walls of the room—the vibrations accompanying which sounds are often distinctly perceptible to the touch—occur, without being produced by muscular action or mechanical contrivance. 2. That movements of heavy bodies take place without mechanical contrivance of any kind, or adequate exertion of muscular force by those present and frequently without contact or connection with any person. 3. That these sounds and movements often occur at the time and in the manner asked for by persons present, and, by means of a simple code of signals, answer questions and spell out coherent communications."

PROFESSOR BARRITT, F.R.S.E.—"I know and rejoice in the blessing Spiritualism has been to my own faith, and to that of several dear friends of mine. Moreover, I cordially recognise the fact that in bereavement and deep distress numbers have been cheered and consoled by the hope that Spiritualism has set before them. . . . So far from Materialism being true, I do not believe a single person has ever yet lived on this earth who has truly and heartily desired to know if an intelligent and personal existence be possible without our present bodily organism, and has steadily set himself to solve this supreme question with all the help he can gain from every source,—I say I do not believe any such earnest seeker after truth has ever failed to obtain a clear and definite answer in the affirmative."

CAMILLE FLAMMARION, THE FRENCH ASTRONOMER, AND MEMBER OF THE ACADEMIE FRANCAISE.—"I do not hesitate to affirm my conviction, based on personal examination of the subject, that any scientific man who declares the phenomena denominated 'magnetic,' 'somnambulic,' 'mediumic,' and others not yet explained by science to be 'impossible,' is one who speaks without knowing what he is talking about; and also any man accustomed, by his professional avocations, to scientific observation—provided that his mind be not biased by pre-conceived opinions, nor his mental vision blinded by that opposite kind of illusion, unhappily too common in the learned world, which consists in imagining that the laws of Nature are already known to us, and that everything which appears to overstep the limit of our present formulas is impossible—may acquire a radical and absolute certainty of the reality of the facts alluded to."

CROMWELL F. VARLEY, F.R.S.—"Twenty-five years ago I was a hard-headed unbeliever. . . . Spiritual phenomena, however, suddenly and quite unexpectedly, were soon after developed in my own family. . . . This led me to inquire and to try numerous experiments in such a way as to preclude, as much as circumstances would permit, the possibility of trickery and self-deception. . . . He then details various phases of the phenomena which had come within the range of his personal experience, and continues: "Other and numerous phenomena have occurred, proving the existence (a) of forces unknown to science; (b) the power of instantly reading my thoughts; (c) the presence of some intelligence or intelligences controlling those powers. . . . That the phenomena occur there is overwhelming evidence, and it is too late now to deny their existence."

ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, F.G.S.—"My position, therefore, is that the phenomena of Spiritualism in their entirety do not require further confirmation. They are proved, quite as well as any facts are proved in other sciences, and it is not denial or quibbling that can disprove any of them, but only fresh facts and accurate deductions from those facts. When the opponents of Spiritualism can give a record of their researches approaching in duration and completeness to those of its advocates; and when they can discover and show in detail, either how the phenomena are produced or how the many sane and able men here referred to have been deluded into a coincident belief that they have witnessed them; and when they can prove the correctness of their theory by producing a like belief in a body of equally sane and able unbelievers—then, and not till then, will it be necessary for Spiritualists to produce fresh confirmation of facts which are, and always have been, sufficiently real and indisputable to satisfy any honest and persevering inquirer."—Miracles and Modern Spiritualism.

Dr. LOCKHART ROBERTSON.—"The writer" (i.e., Dr. L. Robertson) "can now no more doubt the physical manifestations of so-called Spiritualism than he would any other fact, as, for example, the fall of the apple to the ground, of which his senses informed him. As stated above, there was no place or chance of any legerdemain, or fraud, in these physical manifestations. He is aware, even from recent experience, of the impossibility of convincing anyone, by a mere narrative of events apparently so out of harmony with all our knowledge of the laws which govern the physical world, and he places these facts on record rather as an act of justice due to those whose similar statements he had elsewhere doubted and denied, than with either the desire or hope of convincing others. Yet he cannot doubt the ultimate recognition of facts of the truth of which he is so thoroughly convinced. Admit these physical manifestations, and a strange and wide world of research is opened to our inquiry. This field is new to the materialist mind of the last two centuries, which even in the writings of divines of the English Church, doubts and denies all spiritual manifestations and agencies, be they good or evil."—From a letter by Dr. Lockhart Robertson, published in the Dialectical Society's Report on Spiritualism, p. 24.

NASSAU WILLIAM SENIOR.—"No one can doubt that phenomena like these (Phrenology, Homoeopathy, and Mesmerism) deserve to be observed, recorded, and arranged; and whether we call by the name of mesmerism, or by any other name, the science which proposes to do this, is a mere question of nomenclature. Among those who profess this science there may be careless observers, prejudiced recorders, and rash systematisers; their errors and defects may impede the progress of knowledge, but they will not stop it. And we have no doubt that, before the end of this century, the wonders which perplex almost equally those who accept and those who reject modern mesmerism will be distributed into defined classes, and found subject to ascertained laws—in other words, will become the subjects of a science." These views will prepare us for the following statement, made in the Spiritual Magazine, 1864, p. 336: "We have only to add, as a further tribute to the attainments and honours of Mr. Senior, that he was by long inquiry and experience a firm believer in spiritual power and manifestations. Mr. Home was his frequent guest, and Mr. Senior made no secret of his belief among his friends. He it was who recommended the publication of Mr. Home's recent work by Messrs. Longmans, and he authorised the publication, under initials, of one of the striking incidents there given, which happened to a near and dear member of his family."

WHAT CONJURERS SAY ABOUT PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

Mediums, who are the instruments of an external agency, have, more than once, been confronted with conjurers who deceive by sleight of hand; and in the same manner that no man of science who has thoroughly and fairly investigated the phenomena has failed to become convinced of their reality, so no conjurer who has been confronted with the same facts has been able to explain their occurrence by prestidigitation. Houdin, Jacobs, Bellachini, Hermann, Kellar, and others have already confessed their powerlessness to produce under the same conditions what occurs without human intervention in the presence of a medium.

Testimony of Robert Houdin.

The Marquis Endes de Mirville published during the lifetime of Houdin two letters from the latter, in his "Mémoire adressé à MM. les membres de l'Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques, sur un grand nombre de phénomènes merveilleux intéressant également la Religion, la Science, et les hommes du Monde," in which the conjurer confesses his inability to explain the phenomena he witnessed in the presence of Alexis, the clairvoyant. A circumstantial account is given of M. de Mirville's visit to Houdin for the purpose of engaging him in this investigation, of the latter's confidence in his own ability to detect the trick, and of what took place at the séance, the conditions of which were entirely under Houdin's control. This account extends over twelve pages, and its accuracy is confirmed by Houdin in the first of the documents now translated:—

"Although very far from accepting the eulogies which M. — is good enough to bestow upon me, and especially insisting that I am not at all committed to opinions, either in favour of magnetism or against it, I can, nevertheless, not refrain from declaring that the facts above reported are entirely correct (sont de la plus complète exactitude), and that, the more I reflect upon them, the more impossible I find it to rank them among those which belong to my art and profession.

A fortnight later, M. de Mirville received another letter, in which the following, referring to another séance, occurs:—

"I have, therefore, returned from this séance as astonished as it is possible to be, and persuaded that it is utterly impossible that chance or skill could ever produce effects so wonderful (sont si fait impossible que le hasard ou l'adresse puisse jamais produire des effets aussi merveilleux).— I am, monsieur, &c.,

"May 18th, 1847. (Signed) ROBERT HOUDIN."

Testimony of Harry Kellar.

Harry Kellar, a distinguished professor of legerdemain, investigated the slate-writing phenomena which occurred in the presence of Mr. Eglington, at Calcutta, in January, 1882, and on the 25th of that month he addressed a letter to the editor of the Indian Daily News, in which he said:—

"In your issue of the 13th January I stated that I should be glad of an opportunity of participating in a séance with a view of giving an unbiased opinion as to whether, in my capacity of a professional prestidigitator, I could give a natural explanation of effects said to be produced by spiritual aid.

"I am indebted to the courtesy of Mr. Eglington, the Spiritualistic medium now in Calcutta, and of his host, Mr. J. Meugens, for affording me the opportunity I craved.

"It is needless to say I went as a sceptic, but I must own that I have come away utterly unable to explain, by any natural means, the phenomena that I witnessed on Tuesday evening. I will give a brief description of what took place."

After describing several successful experiments, Mr. Kellar proceeds:—

"In respect to the above manifestations, I can only say that I do not expect my account of them to gain general credence. Forty-eight hours before I should not have believed anyone who described such manifestations under similar circumstances. I still remain a sceptic as regards Spiritualism, but I repeat my inability to explain or account for what must have been an intelligent force that produced the writing on the slate, which, if my senses are to be relied on, was in no way the result of trickery or sleight of hand."

On the 30th of the same month Mr. Kellar addressed another letter to the Indian Daily News, reporting some experiences of another kind with Mr. Eglington, and regarding which he said:—

"In conclusion, let me state that after a most stringent trial and strict scrutiny of these wonderful experiences I can arrive at no other conclusion than that there was no trace of trickery in any form; nor was there in the room any mechanism or machinery by which could be produced the phenomena which had taken place. The ordinary mode by which Maskelyne and other conjurers imitate levitation or the floating test could not possibly be done in the room in which we were assembled."

The Testimony of Professor Jacobs.

Professor Jacobs, writing to the editor of Licht, nach Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—

"Spite of the assertions, more or less trustworthy, of the French and English journalists, and spite of the foolish jealousies of ignorant conjurers, I feel it my duty to show up the bad faith of one party and the chicanery of the other. All that has been said or done adverse to these American mediums is absolutely trustworthy. If we would rightly judge of a thing we must understand it, and neither the journalists nor the conjurers possessed the most elementary knowledge of the science that governs these phenomena. As a prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the mediumistic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect.

"Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. If (as I have every reason to hope) the physical studies, to which I am applying myself at this time, succeed, I shall be able to establish clearly, and that by public demonstration, the immense line of demarcation which separates mediumistic phenomena from conjuring proper, and then equivocation will be no longer possible, and persons will have to yield to evidence, or deny through premeditation to deny."

"Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also the individuality of the spirit in 'spiritual manifestation.' I authorise you, dear sir, to insert this letter in your next number, if agreeable to you," &c., &c.

Testimony of Samuel Bellachini.

Samuel Bellachini, Court Conjurer at Berlin, made the following declaration in December, 1877:—

"I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Bern; Butlerof, in St. Petersburg, to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the 'How' of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a notary and witnesses.

"Berlin, December 6th, 1877. (Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI."

ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By "M.A. (Oxon.)."

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct séances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experiences in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two, of negative, passive temperament, and preferably of the female sex, the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each sitter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Scepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitter spirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear. Patience is essential, and it may be necessary to meet ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such a trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful séance.

The first indications of success usually are a cold breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twitchings of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not aiding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over, but not in contact with, it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if the attempt to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might disconcert an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will check noisy manifestations.

Lastly, try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your reason. Do not enter into a very solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well-grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.

A CASE OF SPIRIT IDENTITY.

By "M. A. (Oxon.)."

The story that I am about to relate is within my own personal knowledge. The actors in it are known to me, and though I cannot publish their names, I can give my own personal attestation to the exact accuracy of the record which follows. The facts are of recent occurrence. I had an account of them from the lips of one of the chief actors, and I have before me the written corroboration in full detail of the other person intimately concerned.

The actors, two in the body and two out of the body, are Mr. X., a gentleman of position in a neighbouring county, a careful and cautious observer, a man of high scientific reputation and attainments, very accurate in all that he states, a man of the world, and a man of affairs; Mrs. X., his wife, who passed from this world some three years ago, and whose return to it lately in spirit I am to record; Mrs. Y., the medium of that return and identification, a lady in private life whom I cannot further indicate than by saying that she is a personal friend of my own and of many leading Spiritualists; Mrs. Z., also a dweller in the spirit-world, and well-known to me before her departure from this state.

Mrs. X., I should premise, was not known to Mrs. Y. before her departure. It was a desire for knowledge of her state and of communication with her that led to the introduction of Mr. X. to Mrs. Y. through the kindness of Mrs. Z., a common friend.

On the 4th of May last, Mrs. Y. wrote to Mr. X., saying in effect that she had clairvoyantly seen Mrs. X., that she had expressed her pleasure at seeing in Mrs. Y.'s garden some sunflowers which Mr. X. had sent her from his own garden; they were the most beautiful, she said, that she had ever seen on earth, adding further that the last thing her husband had given her was a sunflower, and that she had shown it to her friend, Mrs. Z., who had passed into the other life some nine months previously. "Why?" (Mrs. Z., as she related, very characteristically remarked to her) "it is a shield, a beautiful shield, that your husband has given you!" This had been clairaudiently conveyed to Mrs. Y., and she recorded what had been said without comment, as being external to her knowledge, for the benefit of Mr. X.

He returned an answer on the following day, which is now before me. "For some time after reading your letter," he writes to Mrs. Y., "two of the three statements of my dear wife's which it reports, puzzled me exceedingly. At length, however, I remembered what seemed to make all clear. Then, without first telling him the object I had in view in putting them, I put questions to John (the gardener), his answers to which showed that his memory completely confirms mine."

Mr. X. goes on to explain that in his garden he grew a particular variety of double orange sunflower, which both he and his wife much admired. Though in no degree special to Mr. X.'s garden, "it is, nevertheless, the fact that my wife and I thought them more beautiful than the other kinds of sunflowers, and that my dear wife never saw them in any garden but our own."

"The first of the three statements was thus most obviously in the completest possible accordance with the literal fact. But at first I could not understand the statement that the last thing I ever gave her was a sunflower. One does not give to one's wife, or to a lady at all, a sunflower, a foot in diameter, to wear, or to place on a table. Nor could I understand why that sunflower should be shown to Mrs. Z."

"I remembered, however, that Mrs. Z. was visiting us in 1881, about a week after my son's funeral. Walking in the garden with my wife, she observed a large brown-centred sunflower which delighted her exceedingly; so much that my wife, who had previously not cared for brown-centred sunflowers, took it into great favour, and thenceforward always spoke of it as 'Mrs. Z.'s sunflower.'

"The time came when I had to ask John to gather some flowers to put in her coffin. I gave him some directions as to which to gather for the purpose. He brought them, and I put them into the coffin myself, he standing by. There was room for some more. John suggested Mrs. Z.'s sunflower. I feared it was too large. John answered, 'She went to see it every day, sir, since Mrs. Z. was here.' So I asked him to fetch it. It was the last flower that I placed in the coffin. In this sense it is literally true that the last thing I gave her was a sunflower. And it was 'Mrs. Z.'s sunflower.' Hence the reason for showing your flowers to Mrs. Z."

I have been thus minute in relating the verification of these three statements, because they were outside Mrs. Y.'s knowledge, and because one of them, especially, was very precise and singularly unlikely to be true. It was directly given to Mrs. Y., no one else being present, and is not, therefore, to be accounted for by thought-reading or any of those devices by which spirit-action is sought sometimes to be explained or explained away.*

But this is not all. While Mrs. Y. was writing her letter to Mr. X., she observed Mrs. X. present, and said in effect that it would be very gratifying to Mr. X. if she could write a message to him. The reply was that she could not write then, but would come later and try to write if a pencil were provided. Two or three days after she came and did actually write slowly and with difficulty in the middle of a sheet of paper the words, "Yours affectionately, Anne X.," signing her full name. Mrs. Y. did

* I have received from Mrs. Y., to whom I sent my narrative for verification, a letter giving her own narrative, which is a little more precise than that given in her letter to Mr. X. Her perception of the spirit and the conversation were, of course, due to what are called abnormal faculties of clairvoyance and clairaudience. "The thing all came about in this way. Mr. X. sent me some little seedling sunflower plants, which were put in a frame in the garden; and a week after they came, or it may have been more than a week before I was well enough to go and see them—but at any rate, when I did go I was struck with the small, poor appearance of the plants in contrast to what they were shortly to develop into. While thinking of the great beauty hidden in them, and how it resembled the spirit hidden within us, Mrs. X. stood beside me. She greeted me, and said she was glad I had these plants because they were the most beautiful she had ever seen. I went into the house, and she and her children came with me. It was then that she told me that the last earthly thing her husband had given her was a sunflower, and that she had shown it to Mrs. Z., who had said, 'Why it is a shield, a beautiful shield, that your husband has given you.' Mrs. X. thought Mrs. Z.'s remark most characteristic of her."

not know what her first name was, had never heard it; nor did she know Mrs. X.'s handwriting. She forwarded the paper just as it was to Mr. X.

On the 12th of May he replies:—

"That direct writing is in my wife's hand. This admits of no question. I had no need to do so, but I have compared it with letters of my dear wife's, and also with a legal document copied by her. I have also asked my secretary to compare it with the latter. He says that the hand which wrote the one wrote the other.

"Certainly you never heard from me that my dear wife's Christian name was Anne. I never mentioned it to you."

On the 12th of June Mr. X. further writes:—

"I have shown that wonderful direct writing of my dear wife's to my son . . . &c., and he admits that it is unquestionably his mother's.

"And I have made a curious discovery bearing upon it. We may suppose that the direct writing was executed with difficulty. It was more difficult, I mean, to the writer than to write a letter, for example, while she was here. Now, writing on linen is more difficult than writing on paper. The capital A and capital X,* though most unquestionably my wife's, were yet different from any such capitals in her letters.

"But they are indistinguishable from some such letters of hers which I have found written on linen—absolutely indistinguishable."

I have sent this narrative to Mrs. Y., the medium of communication, and she authorises me to state that the facts are exactly recorded.

We have here, then, information conveyed which was not within the knowledge of the medium, nor of any person present, which information was afterwards verified.

We have next the signature of a "dead" person, which was exact and characteristic.

If this is not to be accepted as evidence of the presence of that person in our world after death, of her continued life and individuality, and of her power in her disembodied state over material substance, I desire to know what better explanation of the facts can be given.

If the case stood alone and solitary in our experience, it would raise a strong presumption in favour of the survival of our individuality after physical death. But it is an unit among a vast and coherent body of experience not confined to any age or to any people, but common to human nature, and granted with, perhaps, greater frequency to this age, which so needs such evidence.

On such testimony it is—testimony fresh and capable of being verified on the spot, and attested by living witnesses of unimpeachable position and character, and not on tradition or hearsay—it is on such testimony that Spiritualists ground their conviction that there is nothing in physical death to impair the continuity of individual existence. A pious belief, a general hope that all the generations of humanity have shared, is thus turned into a demonstrated fact, scientifically proven, unless Spiritualists are wrong in their interpretation of the evidence before them.

They do not find, however, by search the most painstaking, any explanation that covers the facts, except that which naturally and obviously suggests itself—viz., that the pious belief, the universal instinct of humanity, is right, and Man survives the change called Death.

The Social Drift, erroneously printed in a previous number Social Strife, edited by A. B. Wood, is an "independent, progressive, and liberal" journal, published at Mukwonago, Michigan. It does not profess Spiritualism, but quotes freely from Spiritualist publications, including "LIGHT," as do many American journals.

PHASES OF MATERIALIZATION.

IN THE

OBJECTIVE PHENOMENA OF SPIRITUALISM.

I PASS TO CASES WHERE

(3) THE PROCESS OF FORMATION HAS BEEN WATCHED THROUGHOUT.

I remember well in the year 1872 watching repeatedly the gradual formation of the head and bust of John and Katie King at the sésances of Herne and Williams. I have before stated that these materializations took place over the table at which the observers were sitting, and that the faces and busts so presented were subject to close observation by the aid of the light or lamp which was held before the face. I have in this way watched the gradual development of the features, looking directly into the eyes, which were on a level with my own. I have seen John King in every conceivable stage of development and growth, and that under conditions where it was what we are accustomed to call "physically impossible" for a body to be placed unless it reclined on the table, which it certainly did not, or unless the piece of furniture itself was so adapted as to permit a man and woman to stand in its midst and play their nightly tricks. Not even the most rabid incredulity is likely to maintain that proposition.

The Spiritualist journals of that period are full of such records as this, which I quote as a specimen.*

"John King showed himself with great distinctness. At first the upper part of his face was seen; then he said he would try to manufacture his beard, when he soon appeared with a turban on his head; his square, massive brow and straight, sharp nose being quite conspicuous, as well as his dark-coloured beard. The neck under the ear was quite bare and white."

Mrs. Nosworthy records in The Spiritualist† a séance held in Liverpool with a private medium, in the month of September, 1875, her father, Mr. George Thompson, and Dr. Hitchman being also present. The cabinet was formed by hanging a curtain of green baize over an angle of the small room in which the observers sat. Careful examination by an architect showed that no communication with the exterior was possible. The light from a paraffin lamp was sufficient to see the faces of the sitters. The material part of the narrative is this:—

"A short time after the retirement of the medium, the curtains were drawn aside, and a dim shadowy vapour appeared in which was faintly outlined the human form. This vapour gradually grew more dense; a head and arms were fashioned from it, and the arm immediately began to manipulate the vapoury mass below it until the whole assumed the figure of a tall man clothed in white raiment. This man quickly showed us that although he had appeared as a vapour, and literally manufactured himself in our presence, he was no longer a cloud, by coming out into the room and giving each sitter a grasp of his strong, tangible hand. More light was then permitted us, and we could see that the spirit was a majestic, grave-looking old man with long, flowing white hair and beard. After remaining out of the cabinet for a considerable time this spirit retired to the spot whence he had issued, and standing up therein with curtain held back by his own up-lifted arm, he beckoned each sitter in succession to come up and stand close to him and his medium; whilst there he gazed steadily into our eyes and invited us to do the same with him. My father was enabled to perceive that he was fair, almost of pink and white complexion, and that he had a reverend and dignified aspect. He 'stood holding up the green curtain with one arm' and pointed 'with the other to his entranced medium. We were then visited by three other spirits.'"

On another occasion "the spirits were seen forming themselves. Once or twice they showed themselves at the entrance of the cabinet, materialized only to the waist."

The actual process of growth has been observed in the presence of many mediums with sufficient accuracy to enable us to say that it is not always the same, so far as can be judged.

In some cases a patch of nebulous, and generally more or less self-luminous substance is seen on the carpet in front of the cabinet. This, if carefully observed, would probably be found to be analogous in kind to those floating masses of luminous vapour of which I have before spoken as the pabulum used by the invisible operators. It would also probably be found to be in agitation as though subjected to some form of action which imparted to it a circular motion. Gradually this white mass is seen to grow until it assumes the form of a human being. This process has been seen at the Eddy sésances, at Miss Wood's, and is described in the following extract from a letter* by Mr. Orthwaite, describing various cases of materialization in front of the cabinet. The medium was Mrs. Esperance, and the so-called cabinet was improvised with shawls stretched across an angle of the room in which the séance was held, in a private house. Thirty persons were present, and several forms appeared. The part of the record material to my present purpose is as follows:—

"A piece of something white appeared to be kicked out of the cabinet, and then spreading itself on the floor resembled a white pocket-handkerchief. This gradually increased in size until it appeared to be about as big as an infant. Whilst this little thing continued to fight its way out, it grew larger and larger until it seemed about four feet high. At this stage, as though exhausted, it rested for a few moments and again commenced throwing its arms about and growing still taller until it added about two feet more to its height, the bulk increasing in proportion, and then at the height of six feet it was distinctly as if that the white patch had grown into the form of a man."

The Boston Herald has always been fair enough to publish impartial accounts of sésances with different mediums. In a recent number a long account of a highly successful sitting with Slade is reported.

PHYSICAL EFFECTS THROUGH SYMPATHY.—Dr. BROWN-SEQUARD related recently, at a meeting of the French Academy of Medicine, the following as having come under his own observation:—"A little girl was looking out from an upper opened window, with her arms resting on the sill. The support of the sash gave way, and it fell upon her arms. Her mother, who witnessed the accident, fainted, and some time passed before she recovered; she was then conscious of pain in her arms, on each of which was found a bruise corresponding to those on the child's where the sash had fallen." Coming from a less accredited source, such a statement would provoke a smile of incredulity, but Dr. Brown-Sequard's position in science does not allow of any such way of disposing of a statement which he vouches for.—St. James's Gazette.

DEMATERIALIZATION.—Mr. J. Wetherbee, in his "Boston Letter" to the Spiritual Offering, October 3rd, alludes to a séance with Mrs. Fairchild; we compress his narrative:—"The medium was entranced outside the little cabinet, and there remained in sight of the circle to the end. I had explored the cabinet. Within two minutes of the medium's entrancement five spirit-forms came out of it in succession, and moved about the room, lighted enough to enable me to see the faces of friends seated opposite. A detail of all the manifestations would be monotonous: there were several dematerialisations in sight of the circle, one of which I shall try to describe. A spirit form came into our midst, and was recognised by Mr. Bailey—founder and ex-editor of the Boston Herald—as his mother; they embraced each other; as I gazed at the spirit form it disappeared! This was a phenomenon that I had long desired to witness—an instantaneous evanishment of a materialised spirit form. The whole séance had been very interesting, but this disappearance, as in the twinkling of an eye, of an apparently solid human form, strikes me as being worthy of record. Ocular demonstration such as this throws a lustre over the whole of this order of manifestation, enabling us to overstep the question of 'fraud,' and landing us on the plane of a demonstrated truth."

Medium, February 20th, 1880, p. 118.

SOMETHING FOR CONSIDERATION.

The following is from a communication signed "M.," in the Religio-Philosophical Journal of August 8th:—

"I wish to comment upon some facts connected with Spiritualism, that may have a greater significance than is usually attached to them; and upon some circumstances about them which, I believe, are erroneously interpreted. I shall first briefly allude to three typical cases. A few years ago, Mr. Crookes undertook to investigate the phenomena of materialisation. He conducted his experiments in his own house, under strict test conditions. He chiefly employed as his medium Miss F. Cook, and gave the amplest testimony as to the genuineness of the manifestations through her mediumship. A few years later, this same medium, then become Mrs. Corner, at a séance at 38, Great Russell-street, was intercepted outside the cabinet representing a spirit. The facts were detailed in the Times by Sir G. Sitwell and Mr. Von Buch, who, imagining fraud, went to the séance on purpose to find out and make an exposure of it.

"A short time since at Kansas City, Mr. Mott, a medium for materialisations, was called upon by some conspirators, who during a séance squirted some dye into his face when it appeared at the cabinet window to represent a spirit. About the same time Mrs. Miller, of Denver, was charged at St. Louis with obtaining money under the false pretence of materialising a spirit. Her prosecutors had conspired, before the séance, to prove fraud; and it was proved at the trial that she was outside the cabinet, personating the spirit. But testimony was also abundantly produced of the genuine character of manifestations through her mediumship, and similar testimony was also produced in Mott's case.

"These three cases are very similar, and they are not exceptional. I believe that Mrs. Miller is honest; at a private residence where fraud could not possibly be, I stood with one hand on Mrs. Miller's shoulder while there stood on my other side a full formed materialised spirit, with whom I conversed. During one evening at a séance with her, I have seen as many as fifty materialisations, sometimes two at once. Nine other persons, present at the same time, could verify this statement of fact. Notwithstanding, I believe that Mrs. Miller was caught outside the cabinet at St. Louis, and I think it likely that she will be so caught again if she continues to give public sésances; and I believe that it was Mott's face upon which aniline dye was squirted.

"How can these facts be reconciled with honesty in the mediums, and with the truth of the manifestations in general? Any one who has seen hypnotised subjects thrown into unconscious trance, knows that they can be made to perform in their unconscious state almost anything, could be employed even as mediums for crime. Mediums serving for materialisations are generally completely hypnotised, or mesmerised, by their controls, and become for the time mere mechanisms, by which the purposes of their controls are carried out; and those who are determinedly anxious to see the medium instead of a materialised spirit, and who pre-arrange their thoughts as to what shall take place, should not be astonished if they find reflected from the mirror they themselves have brought the kind of phenomena that they hoped would present themselves.

"There is a mental or psychical law that has application to all such cases as those here cited. They who seek truth in seriousness will be met with the truth; they who seek fraud will gather the sort of fruit they wish for. To a large class truth is not wanted; they could not use it if they had it. They live in their own self-sufficiency; they fancy they know all things, and what value can they set upon the knowledge or power of spiritual intelligences? They know beforehand if a thing can or cannot be done; they pass by facts as if they were nought. No wonder that Mr. Eglinton declined to give séances to such people.

"Recently at a session of the Seybert Commission, one of the best slate-writing mediums sat for two hours without a scratch of the pencil coming; but no sooner did two of the commission, who were positive that nothing would come, withdraw, than a communication was written. There is something similar to this in galvanism; all the elements are classed as electro-negative, or electro-positive. Suppose we are going to electroplate with one of the metals, one that is very electro-positive; our battery must be sufficiently strong to overcome the opposition, or potentiality, of the metal to be deposited; otherwise, our electric battery will work backward, and no deposition of metal take place.

"There is an analogous, and more subtle law brought into action when hostile, positive-minded sceptics set up an opposition to the power operating in the production of Spiritual phenomena. We are told that at one place Jesus could do no great works on account of the unbelief of the people. And the record shows that the magnitude of His labours was proportionate to the faith of those about Him. Nothing can prosper in the presence of sneers. Nature will not have her confidences violated or mocked at. In the adjustment of her relations to man, sincerity counts for as much, and is as important, as gravitation."

DOCTORS BOURRU AND BUROT, of the Rochefort Naval School of Medicine, presented, at the Scientific Congress, at Grenoble, a report upon the special action, physiological and psychological, of certain drugs, enclosed in stoppered bottles, upon nervous subjects. These effects, they argued, prove that there is an imponderable and invisible atmosphere surrounding the drugs as well as the subjects, and that between the two atmospheres there is inter-action.—Le Messenger.

MR. GERALD MASSEY, the poet, is now lecturing in San Francisco. Some thirty years ago Mr. Massey delivered a course of lectures in London on the abnormal phenomena now known as Spiritualistic—his first wife having been a very extraordinary medium. One of his most important and interesting lectures is on this subject, and bears the title of "A Leaf from the Book of My Life." During his absence in the colonies he lectured to large and enthusiastic audiences in all the principal cities. We shall welcome his return to this country.

A SEULAR PAPER ON SLATE-WRITING.—A correspondent of the Buffalo Courier, in the course of an interesting account of a wonderful séance with a Mr. Mansfield, says:—"If the communication is a long one, you find the slate-pencil nearly gone. This is no mind-reading, no psychometry, no juggling trick, for you have had it all your own way much more than if you had been dealing with a common telegraph office. If you send a telegram from one point to another on our earth, and your answer comes to you from the person to whom you telegraphed, do you doubt, do you suspect the operator? Do you think the pure electric fluid sent back an intelligent answer to your message? Or, is it not according to common-sense to suppose that your reply comes through another operator at the other end of the line, and if it be an answer to your question, do you not believe it to be dictated by the friend you addressed? Do you know of any telegraph operator on any line on earth to whom you can take a sealed message rolled up in a hard package, held closely in your hand and addressed to a distant place, who will read that sealed communication in your shut fist and obtain an appropriate answer? Yet here this is done many times a day. 'Can it always be done?' you ask. No, sir. The battery may be weak, and the seeker an angular, cavilling disposition, such as infest the world and make it uncomfortable to all who come within hailing distance. To be a medium is to wear your nerves on the outside. A sensitive organisation these human nettles blister and exasperate beyond control. We all know of those whom we had rather miss than meet, who pin us to the wall and strike us dumb. Conditions must be favourable. That this slate-writing, exactly as described, takes place, there are thousands to testify. But what is it? Not loose electricity, not formless psychic power. No intelligence can come from force of any kind that is not subject and under the control of intelligence. We leave you this time with the conundrum—what is it?"

The Phenomenality of the Subject.

SIR,—I am very glad to be pulled up by Mr. Edmund Gurney for any obscurity or confusion in my ideas, whether that is real or only apparent. Apparent, at the least, it must be, so that I ought to gain something, either in definitude of thought or clearness of expression, by contact with any criticism of his. If the improvement is not immediately evident, and I seem to turn upon my critic instead of mending my own mental ways, that is only the ungrateful form which reaction upon an intellectual stimulant often has to take.

Had I meant by my existence as sensible (as well as sensitive) what Mr. Gurney means by it, viz., the objective aspect of my perceptions in general (as in his relation B), the connection would indeed be unapparent between that and the organic phenomenality which I assert. But I did not confound the two relations, for the reason that relation B was not at all in my mind, nor even relation A, as Mr. Gurney states it. I was not thinking of the objective aspect of my perceptions (save so far as relates to my perception of my own body), but just exclusively of that which Mr. Gurney denies to be a necessary correlate of my subjective existence, that which, given a percipient—whether another or myself—would for that percipient (according to and under his own modes) be phenomenon. By the words "given a percipient," I am not begging the question—which is whether I need be perceptible at all—because in my view all perception depends on a capacity of the percipient to construct a representation in response to a subjective impression. We, for instance, have not that capacity in relation to a (hypothetical) "spirit," but that argues nothing against the spirit's perceptibility, that is, against the existence of other beings who can construct such a representation. Mr. Gurney, of course, may not accept this doctrine of perception, though it would be strange to me if so great a master of the psychology of "hallucinations" did not hold some theory resembling it. For I can conceive no genuine idealism regarding the whole world of sense representation as other than collective hallucination. Indeed, that is only to say that the objective world exists only in consciousness. Obviously, therefore, I cannot speak of my objective aspect, or rather (to avoid misunderstanding) of the objective aspect of me, out of relation to any percipient, since it exists only for, and in the consciousness of a percipient, who, I shall contend (for I am not now assuming it), must at least, if there is no other, be myself. No doubt the phenomenal me contains within itself objective and subjective aspects for the percipient, the subjective aspect being the phenomenon regarded as the percipient's feelings. Thus if I am the percipient, the phenomenon of myself is not only the objective aspect of myself, but likewise contains both aspects for me as percipient.* I cannot, indeed, quite adopt Mr. Gurney's statement of relation B, because he there speaks of the "object" as "that which determines me," whereas the "object" only exists when I am determined, and as the objective aspect of my determination. I do not know what determines me to the representation, lamp. I only know that this representation does not determine me, because it only exists when I am thus determined. If I am a realist, say of Brown's school, I postulate an unknown X as cause of my representation ("real object"), but for a differently constituted percipient, X would determine a quite different representation, or phenomenon object. In short, I cannot follow Mr. Gurney in calling "the relation of me determined to that which determines me" "a relation of subject to object." So also we have to distinguish subject from subjective aspect in phenomenon, not that the distinction is radical, for to monism the subject itself is, at last, only an aspect of that world, but because otherwise we shall always be suppressing the distinction in the object, or phenomenon, itself, and sliding from the conception of aspects into that of elements or factors, as Mr. Shadworth Hodgson shows that Mr. G. H. Lewes did.†

Now I concede to Mr. Gurney his supposition that there is no percipient in the universe for whom "I" can be an object or phenomenon—except myself. But I contend that I cannot construct (or "perceive") a world of space objects without at the same time representing myself therein as one of these objects. That for the objectivity of such a world in relation to me, I must be posited in space, Mr. Gurney apparently allows, but he says the condition is satisfied by the mathematical point, and need not be dimension, or occupation of space. Now to test this, we come to the question which it may be thought I should have begun with. I have been using the terms "I" and "me," and what is meant by them? Mr. Gurney says that no more need be meant than "a series of presentations," each containing the relation which he describes under B (and which I may perhaps express by determinate feelings combined into an object), and implying nothing more. That is to say, he dismisses the "subject," and replaces it by the subjective aspect in the phenomenon—the phenomenon itself regarded as "feeling." Now I do not object to the substitution of sentitur for sentio, but I maintain that behind and along with every "series of presentations" in which subjective and objective aspects are discriminated, is one relatively stable presentation in which sentitur stands for sentio. I submit that for a series of presentations to be related in and as one consciousness they must associate themselves with that mode of feeling which endures. I do not want to go behind the analysis of consciousness for an Ego, but I find in consciousness that which maintains identity through the changes of its states, and makes those states possible as "changes" in a consciousness, instead of being changes of a consciousness, which would be the mere destruction of its continuity or identity. Mr. Gurney's hypothesis makes no provision for the continuity of consciousness, and could make none, since it is framed for the very purpose of excluding the subject-object. How, in the history of each individual consciousness, that subject-object is formed and constituted, many writers have described. In speaking of it above as a mode of feeling, I do not ignore the fact that it is really a group of feelings, nor do I disguise my own philosophical conviction that no organic aggregate will, of itself, account for the unity of consciousness, but, on the contrary, pre-supposes that. Logically sure, however, we may be that the unifying function must begin with the organisation of feelings, an Ego being thus constituted, in relation to which alone a world of "external" objects can be perceived. That is to say, the consciousness which envisages these objects as its own is not empty of all prior content; it has found itself in the world before it finds the world in itself. The first objective aspect I discriminate in any world I relate myself to is that of those feelings which go to make up my sense of self. I thus get a representation of myself; for myself, at least, I am sensible as well as sensitive.

* I think Mr. Shadworth Hodgson has successfully shown that the distinction of the aspects always arises in reflection, and is not apparent in primary consciousness.

† See "Philosophy of Reflection," Vol. I., p. 103 et seq.

The subjective "point" in space is not only necessary in order to obtain a system of space relations at all, but also in order to account for every perception of the world in the terms of the world perceived. This account is, I believe, an exact inversion of the true process (philosophy explaining why sense experience and the scientific account thereof cannot but be such inversion), nevertheless, the very recognition of the world as one of which I am conscious obliges me to place my self-consciousness in it, which I can only do by clothing my self-consciousness homogeneously, i.e., finding in it an objective aspect. My consciousness of myself as percipient requires not only the relation of perceived objects among themselves—for which the mathematical point of observation might suffice—but their objective relation to me as percipient, and that can only be obtained by constituting myself an object. I have not only to figure objects among themselves, but also as external to me, and the "me" in this relation is therefore a feeling at some given point of space, in other words, has an objective aspect in space. I quite agree that if I could connect space objects in my consciousness without any reference to a subject, the mathematical point would do, but since no more than Kant can I, or Mr. Gurney, or any one else conceive the function of unity in a consciousness without reference to an "Ich denke,"* there is an immediate filling of space when we represent the "Ich denke" at a point of space. If I perceive that there is a relation to myself here, I cannot abstract from all content here, for it is that very content which constitutes an essential term of the relation: it is that content posited in space.

We come back, then, to this: that not only have we to distinguish the aspects in phenomena, but we have also to distinguish phenomena themselves as subjective or objective—the here so-called "subjective" phenomenon containing, of course, again the objective aspect, which aspect is the representation of myself as an object among objects. For other phenomena the distinction of the aspects arises only in philosophical reflection; for the subject-object that distinction belongs to primary reflection. The subject-object is necessarily an organism, because it is that which establishes the relation of the subject to its external "world." The scientific relation, however, has not to be represented in consciousness as the condition of perception, only that as objects in space we are affected by other objects. For the purpose of my argument, Mr. Gurney's relation A (conscious change to brain change) is unimportant. It represents, no doubt, the inner and most essential fact of my organic constitution and relation to the presentation of consciousness, but brain action does not belong to the objective aspect of my self-consciousness. That aspect is the objective reference of feeling, which in our case is, as we know, peripheral.

Mr. Gurney, who has referred so kindly to the paper he criticises, would be the last to require that language used there in a particular relation should have the character of a generally unexceptionable expression, except so far as necessary to that argument. I went therein altogether upon the "social" hypothesis, which Mr. Gurney regards as unessential logically. I wished to point out that any state of existence whatever, in which "you" and "I" are distinguished with mutual "perception," implies the phenomenality of each of us, and that all objectivity corresponds to what we now call "matter" (in perception).

I was not there concerned to show that your phenomenon of me belongs, after all, only to your consciousness and not to mine, though I do not suppose that my recognition of that fact can be doubted. So in my uses of the term "organism," Mr. Gurney is liberal and forbearing, indulgent beyond what I could expect, but evidently he thinks me rather wild here. I can only plead that I was trying to get at an ultimate conception from which no advocate of the pure subjectivity of the individual mode could escape, not to offer definitions which a biologist would for a moment tolerate.

The only issue I have attempted to meet in the foregoing remarks is that raised by Mr. Gurney when he says: "I fail to see that the phenomenality of the subject is in the least implied in the admittedly necessary phenomenality of objects to the subject." It seems to me that if Mr. Gurney admits a "subject" at all—other than the subjective aspect common to all its perceptions—as one term of the relation, it is for him to show how perception is at all possible except by the representation of the homogeneity of the percipient with its "objects."

I should like to add that Dr. Ingleby's "Law of Reciprocal Causation" has an important bearing, from the idealist point of view, upon the question of organism. I read a paper on this subject, calling attention to Dr. Ingleby's theory as a development of Kantian principles, before the Aristotelian Society some months ago. I think of printing it, and if any reader of "LIGHT" cares to see it, I shall be happy to send him or her a copy on application.

"DARING DEEDS," by J. S. Borlase, is a volume of tales of perils and adventures dedicated to the Governor of Victoria. (Warne and Co., London and New York.) One of the tales is a spirit manifesting herself in such a way as to lead to the discovery of her murdered body. It is given as if the narrator believed what he saw, but who thought it expedient to call the whole affair "an inexplicable mystery." He states the facts well, and their insertion in the series indicates the recognition, by popular publishers, of the growing taste for psychical reading.

MATTER, whatever it be, has no spontaneity, it engenders nothing; it can only be the medium of expressing the idea of Him Who has created a given machine in operation. The organised matter of the brain manifesting the phenomena of sensation and intelligence proper to the living being, has no more consciousness of the thoughts and of the phenomena manifested by it than the crude matter of an inert machine; than a clock, for example, has of its movements and of the hour it points to; any more than paper and printer's type have of the ideas they convey to readers. To say that the brain secretes thought is like saying that the clock secretes the hour, the idea of time. It is absurd to suppose that matter could engender laws of order and sequence; nevertheless such is the absurd error of the Materialists.—Le Spiritisme, from Claude Bernard.

CUMULATIVE EVIDENCE.

No matter how apparently improbable any alleged series of phenomena may appear to the uninitiated, evidences of their genuineness, through the testimonies of credible and competent witnesses, may so accumulate as to render their dogmatic denial without examination manifestly absurd.

It must be clear to all thoughtful minds that if numerous trained observers unite in vouching for the occurrence of certain physical and psychological facts, which have occurred in their presence under various carefully prepared test conditions, the alleged facts so observed must, at least, have the semblance of truth, and may be genuine; and if, as is the case in the investigation of modern Spiritual manifestations, all who have fairly and fully examined them agree in their conclusions as to the reality of the facts, no inexperience and no apparent antecedent impossibility can justify unbelievers in dogmatically denying them.

Greig, in his "Enigmas of Life," p. 70, wisely says: "It is unphilosophical to reject indisputable and proved conclusions because we do not like them, because they disturb our serenity, shatter our hopes, or run counter to our prejudices."

It may be repeated for the thousandth time that facts which have occupied the earnest attention of such men as Professor Crookes, Professor Wallace, Dr. Hare, Judge Edmunds, Epes Sargent, William Howitt, Professor Zollner, Hon. A. Aksakoff, Sergeant Cox, Professor de Morgan, Professor Barrett, and hundreds of other equally competent investigators for the greater part of the present half-century, are not phenomena that can safely be tabooed or denied by those who, in the struggle for truth, desire to stand in the foreground of the contest, and hope to be recognised as among the leaders in the great struggle between prejudice and knowledge, error and truth.

We are now, in this nineteenth century, engaged in a conflict, paralleled by the epoch-making conflicts of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries between the antiquated and erroneous teachings of Aristotle, Ptolemy, and a dominant Church on the one hand, and the much-ridiculed, feared, but finally-accepted facts and generalisations of Copernicus, Galileo, Kepler, and Newton on the other. Timidity is to a large extent inscribed on the banners of many of the soldiers in the present army of modern Spiritual enterprise; they have courageously recorded and published their facts, but old-world theological and scientific prejudices prevent them carrying the battle to the gates, and storming the citadel of scientific and theological error.

Combination and courage on the part of those who now accept the facts of Modern Spiritualism would overturn the citadel walls of science and theology which, in respect to psychical facts, are already tottering to the fall.

If twelve well-accredited and universally known scientists and theologians would honestly and fearlessly examine our facts and boldly publish their conclusions, the present theological and scientific prejudices would be largely overthrown, and the millions of the disciples of Nicodemus who now speak of their knowledge and belief with bated breath, would rally round the standard and march to an easy victory.

Facts are on our side, prejudices and prepossessions are alone on the side of our opponents.

Dare the Archbishop of Canterbury, Cardinal Manning, Rev. Mr. Spurgeon, Rev. Mr. Dale, Archbishop of York, Bishop of Carlisle, Professor Huxley, Professor Tyndall, and Professor Lankester, with Professor Crookes and Professor Barrett to aid them, fully examine the facts and publish their conclusions?

CONVERSAZIONE OF THE LONDON SPIRITUALIST ALLIANCE.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

Although "LIGHT" is dated for the next day (Saturday), it will be in the hands of all London subscribers early on Friday morning, and we are, therefore, in order to prevent inconvenience to those attending the next conversazione of the London Spiritualist Alliance on the evening of Friday, asked to make the following special announcement.

Owing to structural alterations, and some delay which has occurred in completing them, the Regent-street entrance to the Banqueting Hall will not be opened. Friends will, therefore, kindly bear in mind that, contrary to the usual custom, they will only be able to enter the Hall by way of Piccadilly.

The attendance on Friday, if the number of tickets disposed of is to be taken as any criterion, will be the largest ever assembled under the auspices of the Alliance. We are pleased to learn this, because the President has some very important business to lay before the members.

THE Harmonia is the name of a new Spiritualistic monthly magazine published at Waco, Texas.

MR. WALTER HOWELL, an eloquent inspirational medium, late of Manchester, is meeting with great success in the United States. He has just started a new society in Chicago, called the Independent Spiritual Church.

A SPIRITUALIST, of Huntingdon, Philadelphia, states that his daughter, aged twelve years, though entirely ignorant of the German language, recently spoke it fluently while under the influence of the spirit of a German poet.

MRS. ISABELLA BEECHER HOOKER, a sister of the Rev. Ward Beecher, is a firm believer in Spiritualism. An American contemporary has a long article from her pen descriptive of materialisation phenomena witnessed by her.

THINK of it for a moment—an empty, intact corner of a handsome drawing-room, in which nothing is protected by the curtain for the time, the medium standing outside of it, in sight, and then ten materialised forms of men and women coming out of that nothingness, as solid-looking as any of the persons in the room—that is what I call the ocular-demonstrated proof of a spirit materialisation.—J. S. WETHERBEE.

ROBERT INGERSOLL ON SPIRITUALISM.—"I know a great many excellent people who are thoroughly convinced of the truth of Spiritualism. Christians laugh at the 'miracles' to-day attested by folks they know, but believe the miracles of long ago attested by folks they did not know. This is one of the contradictions in human nature. Most people are willing to believe that wonderful things happened long ago, and will happen again in the far future; with them the present is the only time in which nature behaves herself with becoming sobriety."

"APPARITION MEDIANIMIQUE."*

Never since Gabriel Max produced his "Spirit Greeting" has a master in art put before an unbelieving world such a chef-d'œuvre as the engraving before us. M. Tissot is to be congratulated on the happy rendering he has given his subject. All who have seen it unite in pronouncing it one of the best illustrations ever given of a Spiritual phenomenon, from an artistic as well as from a realistic point of view.

Regarded as a work of art there is little to be desired. It is one of the best specimens of mezzotint we have ever seen, and now that an effort is being made to revive this almost lost art—beautiful in itself, but also possessing the special recommendation of being more than any other department of engraving identified with England—such a picture as that produced by the eminent French Society artist is to be welcomed from a purely artistic point of view, apart from the attraction it will have to us as Spiritualists. As an art contemporary has pointed out, for some fifty years mezzotint has been declining, or, rather, the name has been appropriated by an art which has very little claim to it, and has commonly been given to a bastard process which has nothing in common with the methods of the Watsons, Dickinson, and John Raphael Smith. The fatal step was taken when it occurred to the engravers and publishers that to work upon steel would be more profitable than to work upon copper. From the trade point of view they were right enough, for a steel plate will give a thousand impressions quite as certainly as a copper plate will give a hundred. From the artistic standpoint, however, they were hopelessly in error.

The "Apparition Medianimique" is, as we have said, peculiarly realistic. Few can possibly fail to grasp the tale it has to tell, or see it without being possessed of a clearer apprehension of the nature of this particular phase of Spiritual phenomena. It is, therefore, of the highest interest to Spiritualists, and M. Tissot's masterpiece will probably do its work silently and effectively in drawing thousands to Spiritualism who would otherwise never have had the opportunity of knowing what some of its manifestations are like.

Its history is as follows: During one of Mr. Eglinton's Continental trips he came in contact with M. Tissot, who, having been interested in Spiritualism, had several séances with Mr. Eglinton. So impressed was he with the results obtained that he decided at the earliest opportunity to come to England and go through a regular course of investigation. This he did in the early part of the current year. We cannot here follow his experiences step by step; suffice it to say that in the end M. Tissot became thoroughly satisfied not only of the reality of Spiritual phenomena, but he also at length gave in his adhesion to the Spiritual theory. At the culminating séance he had a most touching and unique experience. The veil was lifted, and he saw one whose sweet companionship had been his joy and solace in years gone by. It is not possible or right that such sacred experiences should be revealed in their fullest expression to an unsympathetic world, but the few details of the séance we are enabled to give will no doubt be acceptable to those whose knowledge bids them lend a listening ear.

The séance (a private one) took place on the 20th May, and there were present, besides M. Tissot and the medium, three ladies and one gentleman. After the usual preliminaries of a dark séance, Mr. Eglinton took his place in an easy chair close to M. Tissot's right hand, and so remained the whole time. The doors were all locked and the room otherwise secured. After conversing for a time two figures were seen standing side by side on M. Tissot's left hand. They were at first seen very indistinctly, but gradually they became more and more plainly visible, until those nearest could distinguish every feature. The light carried by the male figure ("Ernest") was exceptionally bright, and was so used as to light up in a most effective manner the features of his companion.

M. Tissot, looking into her face, immediately recognised the latter, and, much overcome, asked her to kiss him. This she did several times, the lips being observed to move. One of the sitters distinctly saw Ernest place the light in such a position that while M. Tissot was gazing at the face of the female form her features were "brilliantly illuminated;"—it also lighted up M. Tissot's face. After staying with him for some minutes, she again kissed, shook hands with him, and vanished.

It is this incident M. Tissot has chosen as the subject of his picture, and he claims that it is drawn exactly from the life. It discloses two figures, set against a dark background—one a sweetly pretty female form, with the head slightly thrown back and resting on the shoulder of the companion by her side. Her face bears an expression of wistful tenderness, which tells its own tale of happy reunion.

"Peace, let it be. I love him still, and shall love him for ever; The dead are not dead, but alive."

Ernest's face reveals the noble spirit he is—full of solicitude, and compassionate love of his kind. The ideal which those who have come in contact with him must have formed (we can speak for ourselves) is here fully portrayed. The hands are held half open in front of them, Ernest bearing the light with which their faces are illumined.

There is much more that we could say, but space forbids. M. Tissot's publishers, we may mention, have, in this case, in order to place it within the reach of the general body of Spiritualists, issued the engraving at a ridiculously low figure compared with the price usually charged for such works. We hope every success will attend it.

Let reputable mediums join hands with those Spiritualists who demand that public mediums shall be of good moral character and honest. Let every Spiritualist and investigator decline to countenance any public medium against whom there are reasonable grounds for suspicion. Let all learn to check their love of the marvellous and restrain their demands upon mediums within reasonable limits. Pursue the investigation of spiritual things with a spiritual mind, soberly, seriously, sensibly.—Religio-Philosophical Journal.

"Ghosts" form the topic of a leader in The Scotsman of October 5th, opening thus: "Ghosts promise to be an early crop this season." This opening, like Clown's "Here we are again!" in the pantomime, gives us an inkling of what is to come. Glancing down the length of a column and more, we encountered the words "American mediums," "haunted houses," "Theosophists and Occultists," "Mrs. Guppy," "Mrs. Oliphant," "Colonel Olcott," &c., verbosely strung together in a "mixed kind of way," too loosely connected for us to follow; coming at length to the end, it appeared to be the pointless result of an effort to be funny, yet grave—as becomes The Scotsman—on a subject written to order, to meet a certain growing demand; the text being a newspaper report of a man at Derby being apprehended on the charge of personating a ghost.

THE New York Beacon Light is edited by Mrs. M. E. Williams, who, we rejoice to learn, has had a safe return voyage from her journey to Europe. She reports in the last number of Beacon Light that she visited, with her friend, Mrs. Anderson, when in London, several mediums, among whom were Messrs. C.E. Williams and Cecil Husk, at their rooms in Lamb's Conduit-street. She also had séances with them at her own residence. At one of these the materialised and self-illuminated forms of several spirits moved about the room and talked with different members of the circle, and spoke to Mrs. Williams of certain personal home affairs known to none present but herself. She writes that she also saw and conversed with her own controlling spirits, who materialise themselves at her own séances, and whom she had never seen before, she being on such occasions in the state of unconscious trance. The Beacon Light is, instead of fortnightly, to appear weekly in future.

CLASS A.—MESMERIC HEALING.

(REMARKABLE CASE.)

For many years I have suffered from extreme nervousness, arising in a great measure from want of sleep; and in the early part of 1882, I had a severe mental shock, which so much upset the whole system that for some time my life was considered in the greatest danger. A complication of disorders followed, which seemed to baffle the best medical skill. I have been under treatment as indoor patient at University Hospital, the Heart Hospital, Solio Square, and Brompton Hospital, but the benefits I received were partial, and not permanent, and for more than three years I have been unable to lie down or to sleep without narcotics.

By the merest accident I attended one of Mr. Price's lectures on curative mesmerism, and was induced to place myself under his care. To my utter astonishment, I at once felt relief, and although I have not been put into the mesmeric sleep, I have ever since the first operation (May 18th), felt no inconvenience in lying down in bed, and sleep naturally the whole night through. The result is, I am in every respect better. My heart is much better, and my liver, which was considerably enlarged, is now, I suppose, in its normal condition, as I find my waist is reduced at least six inches, and my appetite is excellent. I need hardly say that my family and friends look upon me as a living wonder, and to show my gratitude I am using every opportunity of making the blessings of mesmerism known to the afflicted; and I do consider that much credit is due to Mr. Price for the great benefit I have received from him, and that he is worthy of every support. You may make what use of this letter you think fit. I send you my name and address in full, and shall be happy to reply to any questions relating to my case.—I am, yours faithfully,

JESSIE BARTON.

130, Park Terrace, Lower Park Road, Peckham.
July 21st, 1885.

[On Wednesday, November 4th, we called on Mrs. Barton, and saw her and her mother. Mr. Price was also present. In a few moments we were sufficiently convinced that the two ladies would only say what they believed to be true. Mrs. Barton, it appears, had rheumatic fever when a child, followed by heart disease, which is often the case. All her life she has been troubled with sleeplessness, being obliged to be propped up in bed with pillows, and even so only obtaining the briefest snatches of sleep. After 1882 her symptoms became aggravated. We saw the tickets of admission to the various hospitals she has attended, and the prescription papers, showing prolonged and varied treatment under different well-known physicians. There was potassium bromide for the insomnia, digitalis for the cardiac disease, liqueurs, &c., for dyspepsia, and liniments for rheumatism. On April 6th, 1885, Mrs. Barton ceased to be an indoor patient at Brompton Hospital, being somewhat improved in general condition, but very weak and unable to sleep. On May 18th, she was first treated by Mr. Price. He made passes for about ten minutes only, and without making his patient unconscious. Mrs. Barton's mind was quite open as to any result which might follow, and not at all in a condition of blind belief. She slept till twelve o'clock the next day. The effect lasted for a week, when she was again treated. The improvement continued. The propping pillows were abandoned. The fearful dreams with which she was wont to be troubled entirely left her. The dyspepsia passed away, and the rheumatism upon the second or third occasion, and has never come back. Early in July it became a subject of surprise at the Hospital that Mrs. Barton was so much better. It was not due to any change of treatment there; for the same medicines were still being tried.

We asked Mr. Price to describe to us the healing influence as he feels it in himself. He informed us:—He feels a sensation on the head as if hands were placed there, as soon as he begins to operate. A cold breeze next seems to pass down the arm, not within it, but upon the surface of the skin. The hand becomes cool. The power passes out of the tips of the fingers. A warmer influence, however, comes from the palm. This part is, therefore, used when a soothing effect is required. The fingers occasionally exercise an irritating influence. He feels the power leaving his fingers like "something flowing out." He never feels exhaustion. Formerly he used the will, and was obliged to do so. Now he is passive and does not feel as if he was the operator. This, he thinks, is a distinctive quality in his mesmerism, and he ascribes it to spiritual influence.]

CLASS S.—A PSYCHICAL PHENOMENON.

I must leave it to the editor to class the following phenomenon, which, if it was not simply a "spirit voice," was certainly a remarkable performance of my "masked somnambulist consciousness." I am so little of a psychic that I know nothing of my somnambulist consciousness in general, and though once or twice before I have, while falling asleep, detected something like an attempt (quite inarticulate) at a whisper, nothing at all similar to the experience of a few nights ago had ever occurred to me.

Unfortunately I cannot make it intelligible without connecting it with other mystical experiences with which I have been familiar for the past four years, but of which I can give no definite account, partly because the evidential value of the circumstances depends on innumerable, and indeed mostly forgotten, particulars. I have always been impressed with what may be called the mathematical estimate of these things, the necessity of calculating chances, of not counting the hits and neglecting the misses, and so forth. Perhaps few have spent so much time in making estimates for this purpose as I have, but no De Morgan or Sylvestre could appropriately calculate the chances against the coincidences sometimes observed even in a single day. Could these coincidences have been referred to any head of psychical inquiry I might have felt it a duty to bring them forward; but in truth I know of no theory, short of the most ultra-metaphysical speculations, which will at all account for them. These experiences are not singular. Another correspondent of "LIGHT" mentioned similar ones of his own some time ago; and Herr Jankowski (author of "Phänomenologie und Metaphysik der Anormalen Sinnesbilder") has recorded some not quite similar, yet cognate (of which also I have experience) in Psychische Studien.

But what is it all about? asks the reader, with natural impatience at this long prelude. I answer in one word—numbers. Certain numbers haunt me; they have very distinct associations for me, but into these I will not enter here. Suffice it to say that one of them especially recurs in a certain month of the year, now just past, and even on certain days of that month. Latterly, to narrow the problem of coincidence as far as possible, I have refused to take note of mere multiples, and have even only given special heed to a certain high number, being the duplication of the root number. This number is presented to me in various objective and seemingly accidental ways, often directly, but more usually by the following mode. My attention will be directed to some slight incident readily to be characterised by one word or two words. Now, though the letters of the modern derivative alphabets are not natural numbers, conventionally, so to speak, for this purpose they may be treated as having the numerical value of their order; thus, a = 1, o = 15, z = 26, &c., in the English. It frequently happens, no doubt, that the same incident may be equally well characterised

SPIRITISM VERSUS OTHER THEORIES.

BY THE HON. ROSEN NOEL.

If the waking consciousness forgets the somnambulist, then the latter is not a second self to it, simply because it is a blank. Quite true, a thought that has occurred to us may not always be recognised as ours when it returns, but then it simply gets appropriated de novo; it does not necessarily appear to be the thought of somebody else, though, of course, if it comes from outside, through our hands, or through our voice without our mind originating it, or through another body, or even through our mind, though we repudiate it as not ours, then it does so appear—and then probably it is as it appears. And again, when the somnambulist remembers the waking consciousness, it remembers that as the different experience of the same person—as its own—not as the experience of a different person.

When, however, the medium is visibly entranced, then I confess the explanations of Von Hartmann have some plausibility. In such cases can the medium be going about in a state of somnambulism? And yet one must again observe that these imply some want of personal experience of the phenomena. There are other means, surely, besides "binding," &c., by which the observers can decide whether the medium is, or is not, going about with his normal body; for instance, what shall we say concerning the occurrence of materialisations, complete or partial, in the light, and the appearance of the form together with the body of the medium? How does the attribution of "auto-somnambulism" to the medium explain, for instance, the slate-writing that occurs in the presence of Eglinton or Slade? How does it explain haunted houses? Nor do I know Von Hartmann's authority for the statement that Spiritists claim such extraordinary powers, e.g., as penetration of solid matter, for the solid body of the medium, if only that be in a condition of trance. But that a somnambulist can assume remarkable resemblances to persons he may imagine himself is a noteworthy statement, possibly true. And if a medium be entranced, it is conceivable that he might so imagine himself someone else as to personate, and undergo some transfiguration into his likeness. But what if there be more than one figure at the same time? And what if information be given not in possession of the medium, nor even in that of the other persons present? Yet this seems established on reliable testimony. Moreover, the medium can often have no conceivable means of knowing anything at all about the person whose semblance appears, who addresses us through himself, with the direct voice, or through slate-writing, and the circle may not expect the apparition of such a person at all. The haunting spirit alone, in many apparently authenticated cases, has the secret, from the burden of which he seeks deliverance by a return to earth, and this burden of special knowledge is the very motive of the haunting; if he can get rid of it, his uneasiness ceases, and he is at rest.* Moreover, even if a member of the circle have formerly possessed an item of information imparted by one who claims to be a visitant from the silent land, unless this information be now present in the consciousness of this member, consider how very difficult it must be for the medium to get at it by thought-reading. Where is it? How to get it out of a "latent" memory? But "latent" is only a convenient word, hiding ignorance. A man is expecting some answer to a question, and he gets a different one, which he thinks incorrect; only afterwards does he find it to be correct. Why should the conscious remembrance of facts that he, and not another was formerly aware of, flash now not at all upon him, but upon another? One cannot, of course, say that this is impossible, however, such is our solidarity as society, or human organism—even without having recourse to the "astral light" hypothesis of Occultism, or to that "Absolute Unconscious" beyond and beneath individuals, which Von Hartmann invokes as his Deus ex machina. It is a queer notion that of one individual robbing another of what belongs to him by filching it out of some unconscious Deity, in whom, or which we are all reduced to our native nonentity; a Deity, moreover, who, unconscious as He is, yet provides us all with consciousness! However, if I substitute for this Absolute Unconscious my own belief in many transcendent conscious individualities—since I hold that every remembrance of a person who is not conscious at the moment of being remembered (that is, of influencing the rememberer to remember him) must be an in brief by different words or expressions, and then, of course, the exact summation of the letter values of one of them to the required number is less remarkable, the favourable chances being multiplied by the alternatives. In every case, however, the natural odds remain largely adverse. But as, when attention has once been drawn to this sort of sympathy (or whatever it should be called) others may seek it in their own experience, I should add that any seeking or solicitude is perfectly idle. To be always on the look-out for such coincidences means spending half the day in doing silly addition sums. Attention must be awake to them of course, for the incidents will be mostly trivial in themselves. But when the method has been discovered—and how it occurred to me would take long to tell—it is only necessary to remember that if there is anything in it at all attention will be arrested sufficiently often to make it almost impossible to doubt a significance. The condition seems to be some true and deep feeling concerned. To such, apparently unconscious sympathies respond. Mere idle curiosity, or scientific interest, will not elicit them. And now, having premised an explanation which seemed necessary, I will come to the occasion of my hearing the "voice."

It was at Eastbourne, October 23rd. I had been rather pre-occupied all day, and late in the evening, having finished some writing, I took up a book and lit a pipe. It then occurred to me that the "number" had not that day been given. I felt rather disappointed, when in a few minutes one of the little, commonplace incidents with the numerical value occurred in the room where I was sitting with no other companion than a kitten (who, by-the-by, had nothing to do with it). I made the calculation, and soon went on with my book. Later I went to bed, my thoughts occupied with certain abstract speculations unconnected with these experiences. In bed, I was still drowsily meditative on the same ideas, when suddenly, to some internal sense of hearing, perfectly articulate, yet with a sort of quick, jerky intonation, suggestive of a spasmodic, but successful effort to overcome obstruction or difficulty—a breaking in, as it were—sounded two whispered words. Two more common or simple words are not to be found in the language (one was only a preposition), nor more utterly foreign to any conscious context in my mind. For I was not asleep, though drowsy. They roused me instantly, and almost instantly, struck with the absence of any intrinsic sense for me in them, I said to myself: "they will sum out my number." The calculation was quickly made, and the result was exactly as anticipated.

Whatever the explanation, the case certainly has a psychological interest, for it can hardly be ascribed to chance coincidence. Allowing that a sub-conscious dream faculty—the "masked" consciousness—could start an audible hallucination of spoken words for the waking consciousness—(the proof that I was not asleep is in the fact that a course of waking, though weak, thought was distinctly interrupted by the sound, and I could clearly recall that course of thought)—it is not for a moment to be supposed that the numerical coincidence was accidental. It may be suggested that I had sub-consciously gone in search of words suitable to my purpose; I can only say that, consciously the process of search would be long and tiresome, as I have tested by actual trial. So that the least the case would prove would be the instinctive superiority of the sub-conscious faculty of calculation, coupled with a power to project the result as an hallucination into a waking consciousness not in the least habituated already to such hallucinations.

I record this case because I can bring it to book for others better than the other modes of my numerical experiences. For myself, those other modes are alone significant, on account of the objective character excluding deceptive agency. In the case in question, even supposing that a spirit (perhaps an "elemental") impressed my sense of internal hearing with words of the numerical value, that value would have little more significance for me than if some friend—or some one wishing to play upon a weakness—purposely suggested such words to me. The marvel is when strangers, letters, chance occurrences, incidents wholly undesigned, and which, in the nature of things, must have been determined by endless antecedents, co-operate for a result having a particular subjective relation, so that it is the time problem that here presents itself, but with far greater complexity than in the case of prevision. Nor have I anything to urge against those who altogether decline to accept an indefinite statement of such experiences. They are only adverted to here in order to explain the principal incident.

P.S.—I am willing, privately, to impart the number, and the words heard, to any inquirer who wants these particulars for appreciation of the evidence, as also to answer any questions evidentially necessary.

* Read the "Secrets of Prevost," by Justus Kerner, for instance.

influence from his transcendent Ego miraculously restoring the past—I must admit that such a communication as this from the transcendent, eternal, or noumenal consciousness of one individual (wherein all his latent memories must be stored) to the phenomenal, or temporary consciousness of another, without passing through his own temporary consciousness, is not impossible. And the same explanation will hold good about a revelation of the future, which is also in the eternal intuition. But as an explanation of the first case it is an hypothesis exceedingly far-fetched, than which assuredly that of Spiritism is far simpler and more probable—viz., that the individual giving the information is what he claims to be, his memory being in possession of this information, which, indeed, if he still exist, notwithstanding the phenomenal, or apparent interruption of ordinary intercourse with him which we term “death,” we have every reason to conclude that it may probably be possessed of. And if the poor spirit is trying to make himself known to us, how sad a disappointment to him must be these infinite ingenuities of speculation, by which we seek with so perspiring an intellectual toil to evade the appalling and unconscionable necessity of recognition! So a madman cannot recognise his dearest friend, but takes him for a fiend. But I forget that this very fine sentiment is unworthy of a philosopher, who ought only to concern himself with, and be enamoured of, naked abstractions. And yet it must be owned by Spiritism that the intelligences manifesting are strangely oblivious of things we should expect them to remember, if they are the human beings they claim to be; strangely sparing of their tests of identity, not to speak of reticence about their actual condition; which is to me, however, not so difficult to understand, since they have to communicate from one sphere to another, and in the terminology of earth-life, upon subjects with which our intelligence may be quite incompetent to deal. Could a chrysalis comprehend about a butterfly? The whole topic of course is most complicated, lies in the mysterious twilight of occult lore, and is fraught with gravest difficulty. I must say that there is to me much reasonableness in the objection of some that elevated spirits are likely to have left the earth-plane, and would rather communicate with us internally, by a felt presence, “spirit to spirit, ghost to ghost,” than externally through sense—though the “earth-bound” may do so. Yet how many may be earth-bound! in purgatorial discipline! Is it likely that these intelligences are non-human elementals? That is much more difficult to answer. Yet their own constant claim goes for something—and they appear so very human! Animals, for instance, would be incapable of showing so much familiarity with our slang and chaff as these Charleys and Irresistibles display. They might be said indeed to be humanised in our human atmosphere by rapport with ourselves, only that seems rather a far-fetched idea. The dead would be likely to forget a good deal when they take on earth-conditions again, which may account for much.

On the whole I agree with Mr. Massey that the pamphlet of Von Hartmann which he has translated is one of the most formidable attacks that Spiritism has had to sustain. Because the ostrich game of burying the head in the sands of ignorance, and denying the facts is really pretty well played out. They “go through the hollow form of taking place” so very persistently, as Mr. Gurney wittily says. But I hardly think that Von Hartmann’s attack is more formidable than those of Mr. Massey himself, or those of the Society for Psychical Research, to which I have the honour to belong, so far as the Society puts forward these theories as an explanation of the phenomena more probable than the explanation of Spiritism. And this I say, fully recognising the high value of the very laborious and careful researches of those capable and cultured workers in our Society—to whom I for one feel deeply indebted—who have done much, I cannot doubt, to diminish the prejudice of the outside world as to the very possibility of our phenomena, besides establishing the really momentous actuality of thought-transference.

To be honest, the only phenomena that would suggest to my mind any such hypothesis as that of a secondary self are those connected with what is called the double, or Doppel-gänger, and those of dreaming. For if it can be shown that the person whose double is seen was not thinking of the place where the double is seen, or the person to whom it appears, it is then difficult to account for the appearance. And so if I dream of a person in a position in which he is not, so far as his normal consciousness is concerned. Yet it is easy to forget, and hard to define accurately, the rambling thoughts or dreams of the moment. We can only remember a minute fraction of our dreams. But the very fact of one’s remembering a person at all proves (as I have shown elsewhere) his transcendent reality—the transcendent reality of his past, out of which he still influences us to remember him; yet we must also allow for the imaginative, creative power in the dreamer, and seer of the double, which may account for this particular investment of the remembered person. Still I doubt not Mrs. Howitt Watts was right that such dreams are often symbolical, and simply a present influence upon the dreamer from the person he pictures. It must be so when one appears to another at the moment of death; unless indeed that be clairvoyance, and the healthy person beholds the dying, though the latter is not thinking of him. But many well-authenticated stories show that the dying person desired to see, or was thinking of the healthy friend, when he appeared to him. At any rate, a correct vision of the seer coincident with a crisis (either death or some other) in the history of the seen implies some present agency by the seen upon the seer. What is it when the former is not thinking of the latter? That is not easy to answer. What is to prevent our surmising a third invisible agency in such an instance, transmitting the knowledge of the fact, which he, the unseen agent, possesses? But of course there may be conditions, of which we are as yet quite ignorant, precluding the possibility of any such transmission in particular cases. The notion of a transcendent thought determining the impression seems here inapplicable. For, ex hypothesi, the mind of the sufferer is otherwise engaged, and, therefore, the transcendent intuition has produced a consciousness in time, which blocks the way against a present conscious agency on his part upon the person impressed. Only he may have thought, perhaps dreamed, for a moment of his friend, and forgotten it, or the friend may be clairvoyant of him. But if not, then whatever cerebration, organic or ethereal processes are involved, these could only mean for idealism, either the intervention of non-human intelligences, whose disturbance would be translated by the recipient into human modes of thought, with furniture and investment, possibly, from his own mind; or else that some third human intelligence transmits a knowledge of the crisis at which he was present, in, or out of the body, to the person in rapport at a distance. I would myself rather call this a visionary percept than a “hallucination.” The fuller comprehension by the sufferer of his own influence belongs to his future, not to his present; that future, of course, being also in his transcendent self-consciousness; but there it is a knowledge of this very intervention of other intelligences in the process. If, however, we ask where have been incubating the suggestions of the mesmeriser to the somnambule that she shall do certain acts at a certain time on waking—acts which she punctually performs, though she has forgotten the trance-experience, and supposes she is acting quite of her own accord—then I reply, these may come from the transcendent-self, which is in Providential, intuitive harmony with that of the mesmeriser. (“Human Personality,” by P. Myers, Fortnightly Review, November.) But these wonderful experiments show that, while it is hardly difficult to determine what ideas do not originate with oneself, it is by no means easy to determine what ideas assuredly do.

“SPIRITISM,” by Dr. E. von Hartmann is now ready. Particulars will be found in another column.

We are desired to acknowledge, through these columns, the receipt by Mrs. Sharrington of 5s. from B. L. Ward, and £1 from Mr. R. Hannah.

NEITHER good moral character, nor amiability are indispensable requisites of mediumship; but without them a medium is capable of more evil than good to the public.—Religio-Philosophical Journal.

METHODISM AND SPIRITUALISM.—John Wesley was a believer in the power of spirits to manifest their presence, and of this we have abundant evidence in his writings and those of his contemporaries. At one time he said: “What pretence have I to deny well-attested facts, because I cannot comprehend them? It is true most of the men of learning in Europe have given up all accounts of apparitions as mere old wives’ fables. I am sorry for it, and with my latest breath will I bear my testimony against giving up to infidels one of the greatest proofs of the invisible world, I mean that of apparitions confirmed by the witnesses of all ages.”

WHAT IS SAID OF PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

J. H. FICHTE, THE GERMAN PHILOSOPHER AND AUTHOR.—“Notwithstanding my age (83) and my exemption from the controversies of the day, I feel it my duty to bear testimony to the great fact of Spiritualism. No one should keep silent.”

PROFESSOR DE MORGAN, PRESIDENT OF THE MATHEMATICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.—“I am perfectly convinced that I have both seen and heard, in a manner which should make unbelief impossible, things called spiritual, which cannot be taken by a rational being to be capable of explanation by imposture, coincidence, or mistake. So far I feel the ground firm under me.”

DR. ROBERT CHAMBERS.—“I have for many years known that these phenomena are real, as distinguished from impostures; and it is not yesterday that I concluded they were calculated to explain much that has been doubtful in the past; and, when fully accepted, revolutionise the whole frame of human opinion on many important matters.”—Extract from a Letter to A. Russell Wallace.

PROFESSOR HARE, EMERITUS PROFESSOR OF CHEMISTRY IN THE UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA.—“Far from abating my confidence in the inferences respecting the agencies of the spirits of deceased mortals, in the manifestations of which I have given an account in my work, I have, within the last nine months” (this was written in 1858), “had more striking evidences of that agency than those given in the work in question.”

PROFESSOR CHALLIS, THE LATE PLUMERIAN PROFESSOR OF ASTRONOMY AT CAMBRIDGE.—“I have been unable to resist the large amount of testimony to such facts, which has come from many independent sources, and from a vast number of witnesses. . . . In short, the testimony has been so abundant and contemporaneous, that either the facts must be admitted to be such as are reported, or the possibility of certifying facts by human testimony must be given up.”—Clerical Journal, June, 1862.

PROFESSOR GREGORY, F.R.S.E.—“The essential question is this, What are the proofs of the agency of departed spirits? Although I cannot say that I yet feel the sure and firm conviction on this point which I feel on some others, I am bound to say that the higher phenomena, recorded by so many truthful and honourable men, appear to me to render the spiritual hypothesis almost certain. . . . I believe that if I could myself see the higher phenomena alluded to I should be satisfied, as are all those who have had the best means of judging of the truth of the spiritual theory.”

LORD BROUGHAM.—“There is but one question I would ask the author, Is the Spiritualism of this work foreign to our materialistic, manufacturing age? No; for amidst the varieties of mind which divers circumstances produce are found those who cultivate man’s highest faculties; to these the author addresses himself. But even in the most cloudless skies of scepticism I see a rain-cloud, if it be no bigger than a man’s hand; it is modern Spiritualism.”—Preface by Lord Brougham to “The Book of Nature.” By C. O. Groom Napier, F.C.S.

THE LONDON DIALECTICAL COMMITTEE reported: “1. That sounds of a very varied character, apparently proceeding from articles of furniture, the floor and walls of the room—the vibrations accompanying which sounds are often distinctly perceptible to the touch—occur, without being produced by muscular action or mechanical contrivance. 2. That movements of heavy bodies take place without mechanical contrivance of any kind, or adequate exertion of muscular force by those present, and frequently without contact or connection with any person. 3. That these sounds and movements often occur at the time and in the manner asked for by persons present, and, by means of a simple code of signals, answer questions and spell out coherent communications.”

PROFESSOR BARRETT, F.R.S.E.—“I know and rejoice in the blessing Spiritualism has been to my own faith, and to that of several dear friends of mine. Moreover, I cordially recognise the fact that in bereavement and deep distress numbers have been cheered and consoled by the hope that Spiritualism has set before them. . . . So far from Materialism being true, I do not believe a single person has ever yet lived on this earth who has truly and heartily desired to know if an intelligent and personal existence be possible without our present bodily organism, and has steadily set himself to solve this supreme question with all the help he can gain from every source,—I say I do not believe any such earnest seeker after truth has ever failed to obtain a clear and definite answer in the affirmative.”

CAMILLE FLAMMARION, THE FRENCH ASTRONOMER, AND MEMBER OF THE ACADEMIE FRANCAISE.—“I do not hesitate to affirm my conviction, based on personal examination of the subject, that any scientific man who declares the phenomena denominated ‘magnetic,’ ‘somnambulic,’ ‘mediumic,’ and others not yet explained by science to be ‘impossible,’ is one who speaks without knowing what he is talking about; and also any man accustomed, by his professional avocations, to scientific observation—provided that his mind be not biased by pre-conceived opinions, nor his mental vision blinded by that opposite kind of illusion, unhappily too common in the learned world, which consists in imagining that the laws of Nature are already known to us, and that everything which appears to overstep the limit of our present formulas is impossible—may acquire a radical and absolute certainty of the reality of the facts alluded to.”

CROMWELL F. VARLEY, F.R.S.—“Twenty-five years ago I was a hard-headed unbeliever. . . . Spiritual phenomena, however, suddenly and quite unexpectedly, were soon after developed in my own family. . . . This led me to inquire and to try numerous experiments in such a way as to preclude, as much as circumstances would permit, the possibility of trickery and self-deception. . . . He then details various phases of the phenomena which had come within the range of his personal experience, and continues: “Other and numerous phenomena have occurred, proving the existence (a) of forces unknown to science; (b) the power of instantly reading my thoughts; (c) the presence of some intelligence or intelligences controlling those powers. . . . That the phenomena occur there is overwhelming evidence, and it is too late now to deny their existence.”

ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, F.G.S.—“My position, therefore, is that the phenomena of Spiritualism in their entirety do not require further confirmation. They are proved, quite as well as any facts are proved in other sciences, and it is not denial or quibbling that can disprove any of them, but only fresh facts and accurate deductions from those facts. When the opponents of Spiritualism can give a record of their researches approaching in duration and completeness to those of its advocates; and when they can discover and show in detail, either how the phenomena are produced or how the many sane and able men here referred to have been deluded into a coincident belief that they have witnessed them; and when they can prove the correctness of their theory by producing a like belief in a body of equally sane and able unbelievers—then, and not till then, will it be necessary for Spiritualists to produce fresh confirmation of facts which are, and always have been, sufficiently real and indisputable to satisfy any honest and persevering inquirer.”—Miracles and Modern Spiritualism.

DR. LOCKHART ROBERTSON.—“The writer” (i.e., Dr. L. Robertson) “can now no more doubt the physical manifestations of so-called Spiritualism than he would any other fact, as, for example, the fall of the apple to the ground, of which his senses informed him. As stated above, there was no place or chance of any legerdemain, or fraud, in these physical manifestations. He is aware, even from recent experience, of the impossibility of convincing anyone, by a mere narrative of events apparently so out of harmony with all our knowledge of the laws which govern the physical world, and he places these facts on record rather as an act of justice due to those whose similar statements he had elsewhere doubted and denied, than with either the desire or hope of convincing others. Yet he cannot doubt the ultimate recognition of facts of the truth of which he is so thoroughly convinced. Admit these physical manifestations, and a strange and wide world of research is opened to our inquiry. This field is new to the materialist mind of the last two centuries, which even in the writings of divines of the English Church, doubts and denies all spiritual manifestations and agencies, be they good or evil.”—From a letter by Dr. Lockhart Robertson, published in the Dialectical Society’s Report on Spiritualism, p. 24.

NASSAU WILLIAM SENIOR.—“No one can doubt that phenomena like these (Phrenology, Homoeopathy, and Mesmerism) deserve to be observed, recorded, and arranged; and whether we call by the name of mesmerism, or by any other name, the science which proposes to do this, is a mere question of nomenclature. Among those who profess this science there may be careless observers, prejudiced recorders, and rash systematisers; their errors and defects may impede the progress of knowledge, but they will not stop it. And we have no doubt that before the end of this century, the wonders which perplex almost equally those who accept and those who reject modern mesmerism will be distributed into defined classes, and found subject to ascertained laws—in other words, will become the subjects of a science.” These views will prepare us for the following statement, made in the Spiritual Magazine, 1864, p. 336: “We have only to add, as a further tribute to the attainments and honours of Mr. Senior, that he was by long inquiry and experience a firm believer in spiritual power and manifestations. Mr. Home was his frequent guest, and Mr. Senior made no secret of his belief among his friends. He it was who recommended the publication of Mr. Home’s recent work by Messrs. Longmans, and he authorised the publication, under initials, of one of the striking incidents there given, which happened to a near and dear member of his family.”

WHAT CONJURERS SAY ABOUT PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

Mediums, who are the instruments of an external agency, have, more than once, been confronted with conjurers who deceive by sleight of hand; and in the same manner that no man of science who has thoroughly and fairly investigated the phenomena has failed to become convinced of their reality, so no conjurer who has been confronted with the same facts has been able to explain their occurrence by prestidigitation. Houdin, Jacobs, Bellachini, Hermann, Kellar, and others have already confessed their powerlessness to produce under the same conditions what occurs without human intervention in the presence of a medium.

Testimony of Robert Houdin.

The Marquis Endes de Mirville published during the lifetime of Houdin two letters from the latter, in his "Mémoire adressé à MM. les membres de l'Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques, sur un grand nombre de phénomènes merveilleux intéressant également la Religion, la Science, et les hommes du Monde," in which the conjurer confesses his inability to explain the phenomena he witnessed in the presence of Alexis, the clairvoyant. A circumstantial account is given of M. de Mirville's visit to Houdin for the purpose of engaging him in this investigation, of the latter's confidence in his own ability to detect the trick, and of what took place at the séance, the conditions of which were entirely under Houdin's control. This account extends over twelve pages, and its accuracy is confirmed by Houdin in the first of the documents now translated:—

"Although very far from accepting the eulogies which M. — is good enough to bestow upon me, and especially insisting that I am not at all committed to opinions, either in favour of magnetism or against it, I can, nevertheless, not refrain from declaring that the facts above reported are entirely correct (sont de la plus complète exactitude), and that, the more I reflect upon them, the more impossible I find it to rank them among those which belong to my art and profession.

"4th May, 1847.

ROBERT HOUDIN."

A fortnight later, M. de Mirville received another letter, in which the following, referring to another séance, occurs:—

"I have, therefore, returned from this séance as astonished as it is possible to be, and persuaded that it is utterly impossible that chance or skill could ever produce effects so wonderful (tout à fait impossible que le hasard ou l'adresse puisse jamais produire des effets aussi merveilleux).— I am, monsieur, &c.,

"May 10th, 1847.

(Signed) ROBERT HOUDIN."

Testimony of Harry Kellar.

Harry Kellar, a distinguished professor of legerdemain, investigated the slate-writing phenomena which occurred in the presence of Mr. Eglington, at Calcutta, in January, 1882, and on the 25th of that month he addressed a letter to the editor of the Indian Daily News, in which he said:—

"In your issue of the 13th January I stated that I should be glad of an opportunity of participating in a séance with a view of giving an unbiased opinion as to whether, in my capacity of a professional prestidigitator, I could give a natural explanation of effects said to be produced by spiritual aid.

"I am indebted to the courtesy of Mr. Eglington, the Spiritualistic medium now in Calcutta, and of his host, Mr. J. Meugens, for affording me the opportunity I craved.

"It is needless to say I went as a sceptic, but I must own that I have come away utterly unable to explain, by any natural means, the phenomena that I witnessed on Tuesday evening. I will give a brief description of what took place."

After describing several successful experiments, Mr. Kellar proceeds:—

"In respect to the above manifestations, I can only say that I do not expect my account of them to gain general credence. Forty-eight hours before I should not have believed anyone who described such manifestations under similar circumstances. I still remain a sceptic as regards Spiritualism, but I repeat my inability to explain or account for what must have been an intelligent force that produced the writing on the slate, which, if my senses are to be relied on, was in no way the result of trickery or sleight of hand."

On the 30th of the same month Mr. Kellar addressed another letter to the Indian Daily News, reporting some experiences of another kind with Mr. Eglington, and regarding which he said:—

"In conclusion, let me state that after a most stringent trial and strict scrutiny of these wonderful experiences I can arrive at no other conclusion than that there was no trace of trickery in any form; nor was there in the room any mechanism or machinery by which could be produced the phenomena which had taken place. The ordinary mode by which Maskelyne and other conjurers imitate levitation or the floating test could not possibly be done in the room in which we were assembled."

The Testimony of Professor Jacobs.

Professor Jacobs, writing to the editor of Licht, nehr Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—

"Spite of the assertions, more or less trustworthy, of the French and English journalists, and spite of the foolish jealousies of ignorant conjurers, I feel it my duty to show up the bad faith of one party and the chicanery of the other. All that has been said or done adverse to these American mediums is absolutely trustworthy. If we would rightly judge of a thing we must understand it, and neither the journalists nor the conjurers possessed the most elementary knowledge of the science that governs these phenomena. As a prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the mediumistic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect.

"Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. If (as I have every reason to hope) the psychical studies, to which I am applying myself at this time, succeed, I shall be able to establish clearly, and that by public demonstration, the immense line of demarcation which separates mediumistic phenomena from conjuring proper, and then equivocation will be no longer possible, and persons will have to yield to evidence, or deny through predetermination to deny."

"Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also the individuality of the spirit in 'spiritual manifestation.' I authorise you, dear sir, to insert this letter in your next number, if agreeable to you, &c., &c."

Testimony of Samuel Bellachini.

Samuel Bellachini, Court Conjurer at Berlin, made the following declaration in December, 1877:—

"I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Bern; Butlerof, in St. Petersburg, to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the 'How' of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a notary and witnesses.

"Berlin, December 6th, 1877.

(Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI."

ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By "M.A. (Oxon.)."

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct séances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experiences in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two, of negative, passive temperament, and preferably of the female sex, the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each sitter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Scepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitter spirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear. Patience is essential, and it may be necessary to meet ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such a trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful séance.

The first indications of success usually are a cold breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twitchings of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not aiding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over, but not in contact with, it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if the attempt to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might discredit an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will check noisy manifestations.

Lastly. Try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your reason. Do not enter into a very solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well-grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.

MEDIUMSHIP AMONG THE MAORIS.

In the Harbinger of Light we are reminded by Mr. Nation, of Greytown, New Zealand, of the Aborigines' belief in the existence of spirits, and of their still retaining what may be called certain religious customs of their forefathers—customs in which the most conspicuous figures are their tohungas, or priests. In his paper Mr. Nation quotes from a work, entitled "Old New Zealand," by Judge Manning—who knew as much of the New Zealanders as any European—some instances illustrating their belief, among them the following:—

A petty chief quarrelled with his relations, and went off to live remote from them. After a time they inquired of the tohunga if the chief would ever come back. The tohunga appointed a formal meeting, at which he was inspired by his familiar spirit to say: "He will return, but will not return!" This perplexed them. They sent messengers in search of the absentee, and to offer reconciliation. They found him dying, and they returned with his corpse. This was considered a fulfilment of the tohunga's saying.

The captain of a trading ship sailed away with a Maori girl, the pride of her tribe. Her relations consulted the tohunga as to how they might recover her. A solemn meeting was held, at which Judge Manning says he was allowed to be present, being friendly with the tohunga.

"After waiting a long time in silence," says the judge, "a voice, near midnight, greeted the assembly as coming from a deceased member of the girl's family. He was prayed to drive back the ship, which was bearing her away. The voice responded, 'The ship's nose will be battered on the great sea.' This was repeated again and again. A few days afterwards the ship returned to port. She had encountered a heavy gale, and had sprung a leak in her bows, called by the Maoris the ship's nose, compelling the captain to make for the nearest port, which was that from whence he had sailed."

Some forty years ago a Northern tribe sent their best men out on a fighting expedition. Before starting the oracle was consulted as to its success. The answer through the tohunga was, "A desolate country! A desolate country! A desolate country!" This was taken to apply to the enemy's country. But the invaders were driven back, and their own lands were made desolate.

It is common for them to seek communications from their departed relatives. A young chief had fallen in battle. His family held a solemn meeting of mourning. "I had been one of his intimate friends," writes the judge,

"and was invited to be present. He was a superior young man, and was the first of his tribe to learn to read and write. He had thus enabled himself to keep a register of the events in which his tribe had been concerned. I wanted to refer to this register, but it could not be found. At the meeting, held at night, about thirty were assembled. After a time, from the dark corner to which the tohunga had retired, a voice was heard—'Salutation! Salutation to you, my family! Salutation to you, my pakeha (white friend). Salutation to all!' The emotion of the Maoris was beyond description. On its subsiding a little, the voice said 'Speak to me, my family! Speak to me, my pakeha!' The women cried 'How is it with you? Is it well with you in that country?' The voice gave reassuring answers. Question followed question, and the answers were received with emotion and tears. The question which I put was 'Your book cannot be found; where is your book?' The answer immediately was 'Over the door of my house, beneath the thatch.' His brother rose, went out, and returned with the book. After some other questions and answers the voice said, 'I go! Farewell, my family! Farewell, my tribe! Farewell, my pakeha! I go!' 'Farewell!' all cried; 'Farewell!' The voice answered 'Farewell!' again and again, receding gradually until it died away into silence."

Judge Manning winds up after the manner of one not unobservant of public opinion, with one ear open to what theologians might suggest about the devil, the other to what conjurers might say about ventriloquism; but it will be observed that he gives his narrative simply as a witness.

A NEW weekly paper, The Spiritual Messenger, has just made its appearance in Minneapolis, U.S.A. It is edited by F. J. York, assisted by an able corps of writers. The paper has our best wishes for its success.

It is said of the Swedish novelist, Frederika Bremer, that during her American tour she enjoyed the generous hospitality of Madame Le Vert, of Mobile, Alabama. It was observed that at a certain hour every day she retired to her room. This caused disappointment to visitors, but her explanation was that she had promised this hour to her sister, who sat at the same time in Sweden, each for the time being conscious of the feelings and thoughts of the other.

SINCE Spiritualists generally insist that theirs is the only rational and philosophic system in the world, and since it is evidently gaining ground every day among intelligent people because of that claim on its behalf, it would be only right to give it all the investigation it demands. If the phenomena of Spiritualism can be explained on scientific principles, then it is time the world should know it. But there is absolute necessity for candour in such an investigation, and there is difficulty in finding it.—E. STUART PHELPS.

UPON the question of Spirit materialisation, Colonel Bundy, editor of the Religio-Philosophical Journal, says: "The editor of the Journal is charged with being a disbeliever in so-called materialisations. Nothing can be false than this charge. We entertain no a priori objections or prejudices in the matter. Indeed, we thoroughly believe that apparitions resembling in appearance persons once resident on earth may be witnessed at times either with or without the agency of a medium or psychic. We have seen such materialised forms under circumstances admitting of no objection on scientific grounds. We are fortified in this knowledge by the carefully-conducted experiments of competent investigators, both in this country and Europe. Neither do we propose to fix the limit beyond which this manifestation of spirit power cannot be further perfected."

CORRESPONDENCE.

[It is preferable that correspondents should append their names and addresses to communications. In any case, however, these must be supplied to the Editor as a guarantee of good faith.]

Coincidences.

SIR,—I think the Record columns of "LIGHT" ought to contain a heading for "Coincidences" not referable to any other class of phenomena. Here is a case in which a numerical coincidence, I think of a very extraordinary character, was actually predicted by myself, and that not by any occult prevision or impression, but simply by inference from a large experience of similar instances. Those who read my communication in last week's "LIGHT" will remember the reference there to a certain high number, to which the letter values (ascertained by alphabetical order), of words suggested to me in a particular relation, sum up. For better appreciation of the following case, I will now mention that this high number is 99—the duplication of the root number 9.

Last night, I took up my new, uncut copy of Notes and Queries, and glanced at the contents page—having seen no other. One of the topics indexed was "Smoking in Church." This immediately recalled to my mind the incident, heard long ago, of a young pedestrian on the Welsh hills, being caught in a storm, finding shelter in a little church or chapel, and solace in a cigar there. The recollection belonged to the personal associations for me of the aforesaid number, and assuming that the "Note" in Notes and Queries would be of some specific instance, I said to myself (there was no one else to say it to), with a confidence amounting to positive assurance, that the name of either smoker or church would sum out the number 99. I then turned to the place referred to (N. and Q. 6th S. XII. 385), and found an account, in a letter of the last century, of how a certain Archbishop Blackbourn (so spelt) of York had ordered pipes, tobacco, &c., into the vestry of a Nottingham church for his refreshment after a confirmation! Now, if any reader will take the trouble to make the calculation, he will find that "Archbishop" sums to 99, "Blackbourn" sums to 99, and "of York" sums to 90! From experiments I have made with books and directories, I believe the odds against any word or name taken at random giving a particular number to be considerably larger than the odds against naming the particular card to be drawn from a pack of 52. Indeed they are probably not much under 100 to 1.

The first word of the title of the book cited for the account in Notes and Queries is "Letters," also = 99.

I know well that readers will be inclined to suspect that I have overrated or overstated my expectation of this result. No one but myself can know how jealous I am of self-deception, or how used I am to instant analysis of my own feelings and beliefs. But make what abatement you will on this account; there remains the fact, quite independent of the degree of my expectation, that I was led to seek and to find a very improbable numerical result in particular words of a particular passage out of the whole contents of the paper.

Psychography.

SIR,—Some years ago my husband, who was a major in the Royal Artillery, died suddenly of sun-stroke. I was on the Neilgherry Hills at the time, and he was on his way to join his battery in Burma, intending to return to me in a few weeks. The night of his death, as I lay in bed, wide awake and a light burning in the room, I saw a vague form which made me start nearly out of bed, and my little dog ran to the place where it had appeared, and came back trembling and looking so frightened, with her tail down. I saw no more, and though I felt sure something supernatural had appeared I never associated it with my husband, although I had dreamt vividly, about a fortnight before, that he had died in Burma; and of the telegram which announced it arriving; and of the vain attempts which my friends made to console me, all just as it happened after. The next morning I told it to a friend who was staying with me, but I thought little more about it, as I had letters and telegrams from my husband, indeed one reached me dated only two days before his death, saying the heat was awful, but nothing about being ill. I soon after left India, and never since heard or saw anything more.

After many weary years, feeling always that love was "not less but more," and longing to communicate once more with him "in dear words of human speech," I went to Mr. Eglington on the 1st July last, on a bright sunny morning at eleven o'clock, with my little daughter. Almost at once the answers came to the questions I asked, signed by my husband's name, and I recognised some little expressions peculiarly his own. I thought I had never heard such a delightful sound as the moving of the pencil held by no mortal hand; it seemed to bridge over the gulf between this life and the next. Anyone in the full possession of their faculties could see that here no imposture was possible, as the slates were held by Mr. Eglington and myself in the air; besides I believe no human being could write even a quarter of what was written in the same time. Equally was I convinced that the work was not that of evil spirits, as everything was good and holy that was said. I had a long communication from one of Mr. Eglington's guides. I think, since my husband's death I never felt so happy as I did after that séance. It brought those "I have loved long since and lost awhile" so close that one could afford to overlook the loneliness and weariness of the present.

I went again, on October 29th, in the afternoon. The weather was cloudy and heavy. I believe the conditions were unfavourable; however, after Mr. Eglington and I had held the slates for a few minutes, answers came. Some of the questions I was asked to put more clearly, and I found I had left out a word. I was then given some advice in regard to my future life, and the séance ended.—Yours truly,

A. S. B.

Mesmeric Healing.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—In thanking you for recording a case under my care, in last week's issue, permit me briefly to draw the attention of your readers to two important points in which the popular notion with regard to the merits and phenomena of mesmerism are so erroneous as to deter many from availing themselves of the benefits to be derived from the treatment.

Firstly: Between experimental and curative mesmerism a very marked difference exists. Comparatively few persons are so susceptible to the influence as either to fall asleep or to become subject to the will of the operator for experiment; while for curative purposes nearly every one can obtain relief from pain, and the effects are generally permanent; although in dealing with obstinate cases or disease of long standing, the operations should of course be repeated according to circumstances.

Secondly: It is no more necessary to put a sufferer into the mesmeric sleep or to interfere in any way with his consciousness and self-control, than it is for a doctor to administer chloroform to a patient.—I am, yours faithfully,

Spiritualism in its Higher Aspects.

DEAR SIR,—Some years since I made trial, with other Spiritualist papers, of "LIGHT," and although among them all it seemed to me pre-eminent for the tone it adopted with reference to the many manifestations of the great subject of spiritual communion, I found it unsatisfactory in many points, to me. Lately "LIGHT" has again been brought to my notice; and I still observe, though in a less degree, a want of that true elevation of thought, and real religious feeling, which I think should be predominant in such a publication. I notice that you disclaim all responsibility for the opinions expressed. May I venture to hope that you will find space for a few words from me? I find many columns devoted to a pseudo-scientific examination of the facts of "Spiritualism," but I see little effort to compare "spiritual things with spiritual," or to lead to a correct judgment of the matter, by recording what are its "highest phases," and inculcating on its believers the principles which it teaches.

The object of those who really believe in it should be to show forth in their own lives, and assist to produce in the lives of others, the virtues of the spiritual or heavenly sphere or kingdom. Unselfish love, clear truth, and perfect purity of life and soul;—these are the foundations on which the true spiritual edifice is laid. No profit must be made of its great and noble powers, no personal gain be sought by any who would be the true subjects of that kingdom.

REVIEW.

EPISODE DE LA VIE DE TIBERE. Paris: Librairie des Etudes Psychologiques, Rue des Petits Champs, and Dentu, Palais Royal.

This work, elegantly printed, will be acceptable to those who hold to the doctrine of Re-incarnation. It professes to be written, in the form of romance, by our English Earl of Rochester, through the hand of a medium, "W. K.," at St. Petersburg; with an intimation that similar works are to follow, depicting some remarkable characters through their different re-incarnations from age to age. An introductory notice informs readers that one Henry Wilmot was a devoted partisan of the exile Charles II. of England, who, on coming to the throne, gave Henry Wilmot's son, eighteen years of age, some office about him; that young John Wilmot acquired the character of a wit, and his manners being what are called elegant, he became a favourite with the dissolute King, who ultimately made him Earl of Rochester. In early life he had shown good animal courage in a naval fight, and while at court he showed himself possessed also of moral courage by refusing to fight a duel. He wrote poetry of a certain sort, taking Horace as his model. At thirty years, his body being worn out by dissoluteness, he lapsed into penitence and piety, and passed into the other world at the early age of thirty-three. Although in different spheres in this world, there seems to have been congeniality between John Wilmot, the English Earl, and Tiberius, the Roman Emperor; and the latter, according to the work before us, dictated to the former an episode of his life, highly sentimental and dramatic, to be transmitted by him, through a medium, to the world for its edification. We think it will be most appreciated by the disciples of Allan Kardec; and those who desire to read a practical illustration of his doctrine may find it here.

CLAIRVOYANCE.

On October 6th Miss Symons and I sat with Mr. Eglington, Miss Symons sitting next him. I had brought with me a pack of twenty cards, which I shuffled with their faces down and laid the three top cards in Mr. Eglington's well-known folding slates, Mr. Eglington putting in with them a nib of light red or yellow chalk and one of blue. I mentioned my wish that the names of the cards might be written down in the appropriate colours. The slates were then closed and the key laid on the table before me. We sat for a good while with considerable strain on Mr. Eglington, who twice brought up the slates to see whether anything had been obtained, but in neither case was any of the cards turned face upwards. At last Mr. Eglington held an open slate under the table, asking whether it was any use going on, when the answer, "Have patience" being given, we continued our sitting, and shortly after heard the writing commence. When the slates were brought up Mr. Eglington turned the key, while the slates were in the hands of Miss Symons, who opened them, and we found written on the slate, "Ace of Hearts" in yellow chalk, and "Ace of Spades," "Two of Spades," in blue, a true description of the cards we found enclosed. It will be observed that none of the sitters had any knowledge of the cards in question until we saw the writing when the slates were finally laid open.

MR. R. DONALDSON lectured at Croydon on Wednesday last. He writes us: "Many thanks for the loan of Tissot's picture. The lecture was a great success in point of attendance and interest. There was an interesting discussion. All the people, at the end, filed past the picture, which I had the pleasure of explaining to them."

We regret to learn that through illness and other causes, Mr. J. G. Robson, a trance medium whom we have known for many years (indeed it was through him that we received our introduction to Spiritualism) is in difficulties. We shall be glad if any readers feel disposed to join us in rendering him a little material support in his necessity. His address is: Mr. J. G. Robson, 53, Bournemouth-road, Rye-lane, Peckham, S.E.

The scientific inquiry into how it can be possible may interest a certain class of minds; but the questions the public ask are: What is it, whence is it, and what the nature of its teachings; why are they given us, and how can we profit by them? To answer these, very shortly and in order, is my effort to-day.

1. It is a giving back of what has been for a long space withheld—the open vision (Isaiah xxix. 9, 10, 11). If such things were possible in the days of Israel of old, they are possible now.

2. As in the days of old, it is partly "from above," partly "from beneath." Let inquirers read "Robertson on the Prophets of Israel," and they will realise how in those days there were many grades of inspired persons, from "the prophets of the Lord through the prophets of the Temple, and the sons of the prophets, and others down to sorcerers and witches."

3. The nature of its teaching will depend on which of these grades the inspiration itself belongs to. If the inspiration is of the highest, so will be the teaching; if not the highest, the teaching will be in accordance with the character, knowledge, and views of the spiritual speaker; this may be one more or less enlightened on the different subjects under discussion, or more or less ignorant, and on moral and religious points nearer to or farther from the truth.

I am writing at this moment especially for Christians, therefore I do not hesitate to say that my idea of perfection culminates in the Person of the Lord Jesus. And when I find an exponent of the teaching of the spiritual world whose guidance coincides with that one Central Figure, and with the principle of His life and death, I say, this is the highest communion; this is a renewal, the long expected sequel of the revelation of the New Testament; this is God's latest, greatest blessing to man.

4. It is given in fulfilment of promise, it is given to rescue the world which is daily drifting further and further from God, and to guide back wanderers to their only true home.

5. The only means of turning it to real profit is to search and investigate humbly what is the character of the communications, and in the old well-known words to "hold fast that which is good"; to follow and act on such of the teaching as tends to draw us nearer to our God; to raise our spirits nearer to our Father's level.

Thus the whole tone of this great movement will be improved. Why should we not confess in public prints this faith which so many have been taught to hold in private families: why not make known to many souls hungering for light, the blessed beam which reach our own? I should not have troubled you with this had I not been asked to move in the matter by one whom I never met in this earthly life, but who was well-known to many. He has begged me to do all I can to raise the tone of Spiritualism, and to impress on all connected with the movement that the best help they can render at this great crisis of the world's history, is scrupulously to show forth in their own lives the perfect beauty of the teaching given in this (to us) marvellous way; and so to glorify Him from Whom it comes, as a forerunner of the manifestation of His own presence. He is the Beginning and the End of all true Spiritualism. He is Love, Infinite and Endless.

Love, purity and truth, with the power to say in all fulness of meaning, "God's will be done," are required, are necessary, in all who would stand in peace and joy in that Presence.—I am, dear sir, faithfully yours,

"VIVAT VERITAS."

MR. E. W. WALLIS, the trance medium, has just made an admirable protest against gambling, in reply to a correspondent who desired to know whether he could, when under influence, prophesy the winner of the next Derby. Mr. Wallis is doing excellent work in Glasgow.

A TRULY scientific man has no prejudice; he is a philosopher, and never determines for or against a thing until he has tested it thoroughly, observing and comparing its manifestations by his highest reason, and testing his own observations, when practicable, by the experiments of others in the same field.—Harbinger of Light.

IN the Fortnightly there is a paper on "Human Personality," by F. W. H. Myers, detailing experiments by committees of the Society for Psychical Research, and in which he took part. They showed that thought and sensation can be transferred from one mind to another, and that one person may act on another, and may subject will and memory to his influence after the action is withdrawn. These, called "Hypnotic Experiments," are only referred to here. Maybe the subject, if conducted as it should be, will throw light on the mystery of malign influences. At present we suspend all judgment.—The Christian.

CONSOLIDATION AND CONFEDERATION.

"The old order changeth, giving place to new."

These to us, as Spiritualists, are the questions of the hour. After a long period of conflict and transition, the outlook is clearer than it has been for many a long year, and we may now reasonably hope that we are within measurable distance of a harmonious and unified Spiritualism. One by one the old differences and obstacles in the path of progress have passed away or become moribund, and there is now manifest a desire on the part of those who concern themselves with the things of spirit, for unity of action, the extension of knowledge, and its application to the affairs of every-day life. A process of welding together of the broken ranks has been silently working in our midst, not noticed, it may be, by the casual observer, but nevertheless clearly seen by those who, accustomed to read between the lines, have discerned the signs of the times.

Interpreting the history of the past few years in the light of the logic of current events, the dawn of a new and higher Spiritualism cannot be gainsaid. Manifold have been the tendencies towards this end. The first step was taken when British Spiritualists protested with no uncertain voice against the abuses which had crept into the conduct of public circles, although, to the uninitiated, the only apparent result was the practical stamping out of public mediumship. But the pulling-down process was to be followed by one of upbuilding, and the first stone of the new edifice was laid when, soon after the publication of the manifesto touching the conduct of public circles, the attention of Spiritualists was directed in these columns, to the absolute necessity of preparing inquirers and graduating our circles of investigation. The proposal fell flat, but the seed was sown, and after many days it is bearing fruit a hundred-fold. Confidence having been restored in the public mind in the ability and willingness of Spiritualists to face and deal with the difficulties and anomalies encountered in the administration of the affairs of their own household, inquiry grew apace and flourished as it had never flourished before. The progress made in this direction during the last two years has been unparalleled in the history of Spiritualism. Side by side with this spirit of inquiry there rose an organisation which, inaugurated with no flourish of trumpets or noisy demonstrations of applause, has gradually grown into a compact body, including in its ranks not only those Spiritualists who were not in harmony with former organisations, but also many who had altogether hitherto held aloof from combined action. With this nucleus of earnest workers, the principal Spiritualists of other countries find they are in substantial accord, and the result is that a confederation of all who share our common faith has now "come within the range of practical politics" in matters spiritual.

As regards the growth of inquiry, the law of necessity has worked to its logical end—demand has created supply. Confronted with an overwhelming cry for spiritual food, it became incumbent on those entrusted with the public advocacy of Spiritual research to devise some means to satisfy it.

From whatever aspect the work of Consolidation and Confederation, brought before the London Spiritualist Alliance on Friday last (a full report of which appears in the supplement to this week's "LIGHT"), is viewed, few will, we think, be inclined to deny that, whatever it may lack in completeness of detail and universality of scope, it is at least a step in the right direction. We, therefore, confidently bespeak for it cordial recognition and hearty co-operation on the part of Spiritualists all over the world. We shall not now concern ourselves with day-dreams of the future possibilities it reveals, but we do earnestly desire to press on the consideration of Spiritualists their individual responsibility in respect to themselves and others who possess this common knowledge. Now is not the time to stand with folded arms, for there is work to do. The nature of that work, to which we shall again refer, is clearly indicated in the address of the President of the London Spiritualist Alliance. Who will do it?

JOSEPH COWEN, M.P., ON THE DISABILITIES AFFECTING SPIRITUAL RESEARCH.

At a political meeting held in Newcastle-on-Tyne, on Monday last, November 16th, at which the senior member for Newcastle, Mr. Joseph Cowen, M.P., addressed a very large and crowded audience, amongst many questions sent up in writing, at the close of the address, was one propounded by Mr. Alderman T. P. Barkas, and which elicited the following favourable reply from Mr. Cowen: "My old friend Mr. Barkas asks me this question: 'Will Mr. Cowen vote for the abolition of the antiquated law which prohibits persons with occult powers from professionally using those powers?' For example, Mr. Gladstone saw phenomena in the presence of Mr. Eglinton, and the law as it at present stands renders the exhibition of these occult powers for payment penal.' Certainly I would vote for the abolition of that law. (Hear, hear.) I think that if a man can exhibit extraordinary spiritualistic powers, at least he should have the liberty of doing it; and if he charges any remuneration for it, I don't see that that ought to be an offence. The law as it stands was, as far as I recollect it, a law against the imposition of fortune-telling, which assumed a very different form from our modern Spiritualism, which is, rightly or wrongly, believed in very sincerely by a large number of very worthy persons. (Hear, hear.) Therefore I am entirely in accord with Mr. Barkas. I think the law should be repealed, and if anyone proposed its abolition, I should certainly support it." (Cheers.)

NOTICE TO PROVINCIAL CORRESPONDENTS AND SOCIETIES.—As we are desirous of making "LIGHT" in every respect a representative journal, we shall be obliged if secretaries of provincial societies and others would forward us items of interest relating to the movement in their locality—notice of forthcoming meetings and events, &c. To ensure insertion in the current week it is absolutely necessary that the manuscript should reach our office not later than the first post on each Tuesday, and the envelope should be marked "provincial." Too often our country correspondents are dilatory in preparing their reports, and the general condition of apathy which seems to prevail allows of no possible chance of the flourishing condition in which Spiritualism now is to come before the public. In this respect we trust to see a marked improvement during the coming months.

[In this column will be given from time to time such accounts of psychical phenomena as seem to be worthy of permanent record. Beyond the general classification indicated, no attempt at tabulation will at present be made; that work will follow in due course. In furtherance of this object we shall be pleased to receive from our readers brief reports of phenomena subject to two conditions (1) That a colourless statement of facts without comment is given; and (2) that communications are accompanied by the names and addresses of those concerned, not necessarily for publication, though we should naturally prefer to be at liberty to publish them. Amongst the phenomena referred to may be mentioned:—

A.—Mesmerism.
B.—Trance.
C.—Clairvoyance.
D.—Thought-reading.
E.—Prescience, Previsional and Coincidental Dreams.
F.—Apparitions.

P.—Automatic Writing.
Q.—Movement of Material Objects without Physical Contact.
R.—Speaking and Writing in Tongues.

Friends having had experience of any of these phenomena will be doing us a service if they will report them to us, giving—

- (1) The names and addresses of the persons concerned.
- (2) The circumstances under which the phenomena took place.
- (3) A brief account of the occurrence.

CLASS O.—PSYCHOGRAPHY.

REMARKABLE CASE.

[The following accounts of two sances with Mr. Eglinton are from a gentleman whose profession has accustomed him to weigh evidence, and who is an amateur but most proficient conjurer. The friend who accompanied him has also a reputation as a conjurer. We have taken some pains thoroughly to investigate the case. Our efforts have met with courteous assistance, and have once again brought us face to face with an inexplicable fact.]

Our sitting commenced shortly after 8 p.m. with the full light of three gas burners. After several short messages produced in the usual way (i.e., a marked piece of pencil placed upon the upper surface of a slate held in close contact with the under surface of a table), we proceeded to some more interesting experiments. The following message was written inside the locked slate and a marked piece of pencil introduced: "Will England go to war with Russia in this century?" While we held our hands upon the slate resting upon the top of the table, writing was heard proceeding from the interior. When this had ended with the usual three little taps, we opened the slate and found written on the opposite side the answer: "Within ten months England and Russia will be at war." The pencil was identified and found to be distinctly worn away at the edges.

The next experiment was as follows: My friend had in his pocket a catalogue of pictures he had visited that afternoon. Without opening it we selected the first word of a certain section, of which I forget the exact number.

The catalogue was placed in a slate together with a piece of coloured chalk, and the whole held under the table. In a short while we found a word, "Song," written on the slate, and on turning to the book found it was quite correct.

The following and last manifestation, however, was the most wonderful of all. I asked the intelligences if they could write upon the slate if I held it myself, and upon their writing that "they would try," I took a clean slate and placing on it another, with a bit of pencil between, I myself held one end under the table while Eglinton just touched the other. We agreed not to question the spirits but to let them do what they liked. We shortly heard the familiar sound of writing, which continued for some three minutes or so, and it was evident that a long message was being written. About the middle of the message the sound seemed to change its character, and one of us remarked that some other different hand was writing. We now removed the slates and found a long message entirely covering one slate, and written in English, Greek, and French.

It is evident that the change in the sound of the writing occurred whilst the Greek characters were being traced, which was done slowly and deliberately. We also, during this message, tried the experiment of breaking the circle, with the result of instantly stopping the writing, which resumed the moment contact was again made. Eglinton was evidently very exhausted, of which fact I, as a medical man, was well able to judge, and at our request the sance terminated.

M.D. (Lond.)

[Since this account was sent to us our conjurers have tried what their art can do to imitate the phenomena they experienced. In an imperfect way they met with some success. This and a second sance in which no results were obtained, seem to have made them consider the above account rather prematurely sent us. We also, being determined to be as sceptical as we can, appear by our letter of inquiry to have suggested further trains of doubt. The result was a third sance before our letter was answered. This sance, besides being a convincing one in itself, had also the effect of bringing out more clearly and distinctly what was still inimitable in the first.]

November 6th, 1885.

One fact of positive evidence is worth more than many negative ones.

Yesterday I had another sitting with Eglinton, and a word was written under conditions which make any fraud upon his part impossible.

I took care that his nails were cut short; that his thumb never left the top of the table; that I saw the marked corner of my own slate the whole time; yet a word was written in the centre of the slate with my own marked pencil, which was worn away at the edge.

I took particular care to watch each point, and Eglinton knew that I was doing so and took especial pains to help me.

As regards the answers to your questions:—

I. Eglinton's thumb was always above the edge of the table except when unable, from fatigue, to keep the slate against its under surface he dropped it for a moment. But there was not time for him to have written anything himself with it.

II. The locked slate was put under the table for about three minutes before the message was obtained within it, and once was dropped upon the floor.

Both Mr. Eglinton's hands were above the table and resting on the slate when the writing was heard within.

I do not know whether Eglinton knew the question; I do not think he did.

III. The catalogue was upon the slate, and was held under the table, the upper surface of the catalogue touching the under surface of the table. The slate was held in the usual way with the thumb resting against the edge of the table. The book was dropped once upon the ground.

In the first message the pencil was at the end of the writing, but in the other cases it could often not be found, having dropped on the floor.

I have experimented with Eglinton's table and slates and find that it is impossible to open and shut the locked slate during the time taken by dropping it upon the floor and picking it up again, much less to write within it. It is also so dark under the table that it would be impossible to read a word in a book or inside the locked slate, even supposing them open. I have tried to do both and have not succeeded. It is also very difficult to avoid dropping the pencil occasionally.

So that, viewed in the light of the last sitting, I am of opinion that the incidents above related are accidental.

IV. In the case of the message between two slates, I held one end tightly and Eglinton the other with one hand.

I am not certain it was not a prepared slate, as it was one of Eglinton's, but know of no method of preparing one to produce such results, and know no one who has ever heard of any.

The slate was first washed on both sides; if not, we as conjurers should have noticed it. The writing was with slate pencil. We have the slate now.

The message was one generally applicable.

M. D. (Lond.)

[It is exceedingly interesting to observe that some accidents which occasionally occur, and cannot fail to, at psychographic sittings, and which we have known sceptical eyes to see distorted by prejudice, are to a conjurer of no moment.

Finally, we were invited to call upon "M.D. (Lond.)," and besides going over with him the pros and cons of the first sance, and witnessing some feats of prestidigitation which leave M. Verbeck in the shade, we received some additional information concerning the important third sance.

The word written was the word "Yes" just outside a circle in which it had been proposed to obtain it. The writing was big. It stopped in the middle of the word, and the taps came very slowly at the end.

Who suggested the word "Yes"? we asked.

I did, at the end of about half-an-hour.

Was the word written upon the slate before it was put under the table?

Most certainly not.

Is there a single reservation in your mind in the matter?

No, I have told you my whole thoughts. I am convinced.

M.D.'s friend has also made the following remarks:—

Mr. Eglinton took one of our own slates, and marked upon the centre a circle of from two to two and a-half inches in diameter. The pencil (our own) was placed in the circle, and the slate then held under the table by Mr. Eglinton. I was sitting next the medium. No result came and we changed places. My companion then, after some thought, asked that the word "yes" might be written in the circle. We sat for some time without result, and the slate was three or four times placed upon the table to give Eglinton's fingers rest, and was also looked at to see if writing was there. Just when we thought of giving up, FAINT scratching was heard, which once ceased, but proceeded again faintly; and it was only by asking twice or thrice that Eglinton got the three taps, which were only just audible, and were divided by long intervals, compared with what is usually the case. The word "yes" was found written just outside the circle thus:—

Yes.

It is a positive fact that when the slate was placed under the table for the last time no writing was upon it, and from that time Mr. Eglinton's thumb did not leave the edge of the table. No one of the three people in the room wrote the word. It may be worthy of note that the writing was not written with the usual firmness. Generally, I have noticed the pencil or chalk has been apparently pressed with great firmness. This result was quite in keeping with the surrounding conditions, weather, &c.

Mr. Eglinton then drew a larger circle—say three inches in diameter—and when the slate was below the table my fellow sitter asked that a certain name might appear. Soon afterwards Eglinton said he thought he heard scratching, but no one else did. The sitting was shortly afterwards discontinued when, on casually looking at the slate, three scratches were seen in the circle, thus:—

as if an attempt had been made to write.

We had a cheque inside the locked slate the whole time, but no result attended this.

Q.—A WANDERING CHAIR.

"Orpheus, with his lute, made trees,
And the mountain tops that freeze,
Bow to him when he did sing."

One evening, many years ago, I was the sole occupant of my large old-fashioned drawing-room, and with one candle only burning, I was seated at the piano entirely engrossed with some new music, busily practising. Suddenly I became conscious that one of the lounge-chairs was close to my elbow, very much impeding the movement of one arm. This rather surprised me, as that particular chair usually occupied a position fully half the length of the room from where the piano stood, but not stopping to consider such a trivial circumstance, I merely pushed it away to some distance and continued my practice. In a few minutes the chair was again knocking at my elbow. I turned a little round and said, "Well, I thought I had pushed you away, but here you go now," and exerting all my strength I gave the chair such a violent push that (moving easily on castors) it went bang against the surface of the large bow-window with such force that I looked round again, fearing the concussion had broken some of the glass, and saying at the same time: "There, stop there, you are far enough now." I continued playing, but was again interrupted; the chair was at my elbow, and a cold sensation was creeping over me, for which I could not account, and thinking, to say the least, it was rather uncanny, I took up my candle, looked round the room, which was gloomy, and without again touching the chair, I left it where it stood, to find in the adjoining sitting-room a merry party of my own family, who only laughed at me for my story of the wandering chair.

CARA.

[In answer to the more obvious criticisms, "Cara" replies: "I can say with certainty there was no one in the room at the time but myself. My only school-boy son was miles away at his college, and all the other members of my family, then at home, I found assembled in the sitting-room, quite at the far end of the house, which was a large one. As to the theory of the string, the piano being at the opposite end of the room (which was of large size), no string from door or window, both remote, could draw the chair in a contrary direction."

A plausible explanation might be suggested of this phenomenon, that it was due to the vibrations caused by the piano playing. How far this remains plausible after the cross-examination upon the point to which we have subjected our obliging correspondent, and which appears below, we must leave it to our readers to judge. To us such an explanation is inconceivable.]

Question.—1. How far (how many feet) did you push the chair away from you on each occasion?

Answer.—First time about four feet, second time more than double.

Question.—2. Was the house an old house, and the floor possibly not quite level, sloping possibly towards the piano?

Answer.—Yes, very old; but the floor perfectly level, and excellent for dancing upon.

Question.—3. When the chair was close to your elbow on the first occasion, was it front to you or back to you, or sideways? Was it, that is to say, in the position it would be if some person were sitting in it, or was it in any other position, and so upon each occasion?

Answer.—It was sideways. Yes, in the position it would be if someone were sitting in it, and this position it returned to.

Question.—4. Again, after you had pushed it away from you, what was the direction of the front of the chair? Did that direction of the front alter as the chair was approaching you, so that the chair not only moved, but turned?

Answer.—I was occupied with the music, and did not look in that direction at all.

Question.—5. Were you playing a piece which required some force in the execution of it?

Answer.—No, I was playing quietly.

Question.—6. Did you hear the chair moving?

Answer.—No, the carpet dulled all sound.

Question.—7. What was, as nearly as possible, the exact time upon each occasion taken by the chair to reach your elbow?

Answer.—I should say about five minutes.

Question.—8. Did you ever notice anything of the kind before or after with regard to that chair or any other in the room; or did anyone else who may have played music there?

Answer.—No, not to my knowledge.

Question.—9. Do you remember any other occasion upon which an object has moved in your presence?

Answer.—No.

Question.—10. Were you while playing thinking of any person; that so-and-so, perhaps no longer living, was sitting at your elbow?

Answer.—I was not at the time thinking of my departed mother, but she used in former years to sit just so at my elbow, assisting me in my music lessons.

Question.—11. Were the door and window both shut?

Answer.—Yes.

E.—PRESCIENCE.

The following may interest you. The dream occurred between 2 a.m. and 6 a.m. this morning:—I was seated in the reference library, showing to my brother, who is in Texas, a paragraph in an old book, its leaves yellow with age. I said: "I have wished to find this a long time. You see this bears out what I say." What it was I do not remember. Two things fixed themselves upon my mind, the name of the book "Ecce Ecclesia," and this changed sometimes to "Esto Fidelis." I remarked also that while the title was in Latin the contents were in English. I was curious about this, and went to the library where I found "Ecce Ecclesia," but the contents are in SIGNIFICANT EVENTS.

Under this title "H. K." comments, in the Spiritual Offering, at some length, upon the recent trials of Mrs. Miller, at St. Louis, and of Mr. Mott, at Kansas City, on the charge of receiving money on the fraudulent pretence of presenting materialised spirit-forms.

"These trials are to our mind," says H. K., "of great significance, as suggesting the intelligence and power behind the manifestations which are forcing the fact of spiritual existence and intervention upon the attention of mankind."

"We find that the spiritual movement, commencing in 1848, has now centres of propagation in every civilised country, not through any missionary efforts radiating from one point, but separate and distinct; phenomena of a similar kind have been simultaneously presented in various nations, exciting the same ideas and convictions everywhere in all who have observed them. This spiritual movement of the epoch has been, and is, in its main drift, everywhere consistent and harmonious, showing its oneness of origin."

He considers that "the policy of the spirit-workers who guide the movement" may be often discerned in incidents which, at first glance, seem adverse; for example, in so-called "exposures," regarded by many as disasters, and over which, in America, some of the most respectable of the Spiritualists "rejoice when mediums for materialisation suffer temporary eclipse." He considers that such so-called "exposures" have contributed to the extension of spiritual science; and have, therefore, aided in the progress of the cause. He thinks that old Spiritualists, instead of lending themselves to what they call "exposures," should study more the phenomena of materialisation. If the "exposures" had not aided in advancing the cause, "H. K." thinks they would not have been permitted. "We have faith," he says, "in its unseen guides and guardians, whom we regard as instruments of God, and as working in accordance with His laws to bring about a spiritual awakening, and a religious reformation on this planet. We do not believe in any special intervention of the Infinite Mind, to whom there is only an Eternal Now; but we do believe in interventions of His angels, high as well as low intelligences, to bring about the changes, stages in progression, which are a part of the Eternal Scheme existing in perfection in the Divine Mind."

Hence he concludes that "we regard the recent trials as having served the cause. They have brought about the widest publication over the land of the testimony which Spiritualists can bring forward; each of the trials was protracted beyond judicial requirements; witnesses were allowed to relate at large their experiences, and state their deductions from them, which had but a hypothetical bearing upon the point at issue; incontestable evidence from most respected citizens was given as to the true mediumship of Mrs. Miller and Mr. Mott, and the fact of the materialisation of spiritual forms has been testified to as strongly as it could be in an open court of law."

A PORTRAIT of Alderman Barkas will appear in a future issue of The Medium.

A NEW medium for materialisation, a Mrs. Hall, is giving sances in Barrow.

SIGNOR DAMIANI, so well-known to many of our readers, has left London for Florence for the winter.

MR. F. W. H. MYERS has been lecturing in Newcastle on "Human Personality," Mr. J. Burt, M.P., in the chair.

Once a Week is the title substituted for Good Gossip, edited by Florence Marryat. Under the new direction there has been a marked improvement in this popular weekly journal.

MRS. HARDINGE BRITTON recently opened a new hall in South Shields, which is to be devoted exclusively to meetings in connection with Spiritualism. It is capable of seating upwards of 150 persons.

Latin, and as it is some time since I studied this language I could not understand every word, though I got on fairly well. It is a large old book. Its contents are singular, dealing with Cato, Plato, Jesus, convents, &c. It contains some curious plates. The vessels which contained wine are engraved with solar emblems, viz., Cancer, Leo, &c. I have only had time to glance hastily through. These solar emblems would seem to point to the sun-worship, which I am almost convinced was the first and has developed into Christianity. Now bear in mind that although I am a frequent visitor to the reference library, my researches have never taken me into the E portion of the catalogue, so that an unconscious retention of a name (which in itself would be singular) is not to be entertained as the explanation. I shall read it, as it bears upon the Early Church, so that I may see whether it supplies me with any information I need. I solemnly declare that to the best of my knowledge I had never seen the name, and it would not have interested me being in Latin even if I had seen it. But I re-affirm my researches have not caused me to look into the E portion of the catalogue.

W. S. P.

P.S.—The entry in the catalogue is Ecce Ecclesia, Grævius IX., but this is not the name of the book itself, and does not appear on the top of each page, as I saw it in my dream.

[We may point out to our contributor:—

1st. That the name of the book is different from the entry in the catalogue.

2nd. That the name does not appear in the book upon the top of each page as he saw it in his dream.

3rd. That the book is in Latin, while in his dream it appeared to be in English.

Thus, all that we can say is, that he dreamt of certain words which had reference to a book, and that those words appear in the catalogue in reference to a book. But the book of his dream, and the book in the library, have not an exact resemblance, but only that general resemblance which might be suggested in the dream by the words.

The inference is irresistible that at some time or other, in turning over the pages of the catalogue, the words "Ecce Ecclesia" flashed upon his sensorium or inner eye, leaving no traces upon his consciousness. It might be better, therefore, provisionally to say that this particular dream was due to his inner spirit rather than to any cause external to him. This inner spirit, or free-born soul enchaind to matter, as it might be deemed, requires a name. It will be called in these pages, for the time being, the Genius, which, by the suggestion it affords of relationship between its workings and other mental phenomena, seems not unhappy. This probably is that tutelary genius referred to in "Troilus and Cressida," "Hark, you are called; some say the genius so cries 'Come!' to him that instantly must die."

C.—CLAIRVOYANCE.

On the evening of Sunday, October 18th, 1885, I was present at a séance at a private house. Miss Lottie Fowler was the medium. She prefaced the séance by saying that she would go off into a sort of mesmerised condition, and under the control of a spirit, "Annie," would first address remarks to each person present, and afterwards answer questions put to her.

There was much remarkable in what occurred, though owing to the number of persons present there was a little confusion in the utterances. While Miss Lottie Fowler was addressing a lady next to me, she remarked that she seemed to see a death-bed, and heard coughing, and that something, she did not know what, made her cough. And she coughed. The lady did not know that this referred to anything in her experience. But it seemed to refer to a recent experience of my own, the loss of my father, who had died of bronchitis. This fact, that my father had died of bronchitis, was absolutely unknown to every person present. I said nothing, but subsequently wrote the following question on a piece of paper: "Did my father die of bronchitis?" (The answer was to be yes or no.) I was anxious to see if any further reference would now be made to the coughing. The medium took the paper, and without looking at it, and without the possibility of having seen it (of this I am certain), placed it against her forehead. She immediately said something of this sort, "Oh, here is the spirit with the cough again. I feel such a tightness about the throat."

The medium also took three pieces of paper upon which I had written the initials of three persons, two alive, one dead. She placed them successively upon her forehead, and picked out the initials of the dead person correctly.

I was much impressed by Miss Lottie Fowler's frankness, simplicity and genuineness.

A.

SPIRITISM VERSUS OTHER THEORIES.

By THE HON. ROSEN NOEL.

Now, when a mesmerist suggests a "hallucination," or as I prefer to say a vision, to some entranced sensitive, which she is to experience in the waking state (see same article in Fortnightly Review), what is the reality here? She shall see and speak to someone, who, for others, and perhaps for himself, will not be present at the time: the mesmerist, who suggests that he will call on her at a certain hour, does not do so, nor perhaps even think of it when the time comes; yet she is persuaded to the contrary. The reality here seems made up out of the imaginations of the mesmeriser and sensitive combined. But may we not call in also the higher, more comprehensive Providential imagination and volition of some angel—of some intelligence, or spirit, in whose sphere we are, even as the cells of our organism are in it? The vision is thus impressed in due order upon the sensitive. But undoubtedly the thought of his own presence on the part of the mesmeriser, at a certain date, in a certain place, is actually a degree of such presence, especially in co-operation with the imagination of the sensitive, already impressed with the influence of his dominating personality. All tends to show that what we term "real" bodily presence is only another kind of ideal presence: it is only presence in the thought of some thinkers, either including, or not including the consciousness of the person whose body appears. In this case, however, the mesmeriser's foresight of the future vision of himself by the sensitive may be equivalent to a present consciousness he might have of this when the moment arrives—the whole of his conscious part in the transaction may therefore have already occurred. The future appearance was determined by the past volition. And whether objects in the outer world could be displaced by the apparition depends only on what outer sphere it appears in. Given certain conditions, and you would get what Theosophists call a "projection of the astral form," or what Spiritists call a "materialisation."

As to "veridical hallucinations," however, which is the name our Psychical Researchers have invented for these truth-revealing communications, to distinguish them from "morbid hallucinations," which have according to them no objective basis—why call them "hallucinations" at all? The "sensory centres" being affected, I do not even recognise a physiological justification for this. The "object" perceived is equally "outside" the individual mind—foreign, alien to it, equally perceived object, as distinguished from subject. It is in every case implicitly my percept, and representation to me of a non-Ego,—a not-me.

But why should an object, only because it is outside my body, and affects my perceptive power through the retina, primarily, be called more real than one that affects my perceptive power primarily through the cortical tracts, which are equally "outside" me, and must be constantly under influence from agencies external to them? Even in the "morbid" percept something outside affects my perceptive power; obviously so in the "veridical." Probably, not a thought or imagination can be thought or imagined alone.

Moreover, it is admitted by the working members of our Society that there is an object—a body as well as a soul—a "real" locality, too—"outside" not only myself, but outside my body also, in these "veridical hallucinations," though the ideational cortical tracts may be primarily affected by it. One may see a friend dying, and in the very place where he really is. If that is clairvoyance, it is not "hallucination" at all. Neural and ethereal vibrations (suppose) impress an external reality upon you, in one case, and other ethereal vibrations impress the same on you by the retina in the more usual way; but I don't know why the first should be more of a "hallucination" than the second. The word suggests falsehood, deception, not reality. In any case, the object perceived is outside my body, though the immediate occasion of the percept may be, say, a lesion, or a poisoned state of the blood. For in no such instance do I perceive my own brain, but always something else. The occasion is equally a disturbance in the optic or auditory nerve, and sensory centres, however induced, whether by rays of light or otherwise. If you were in a condition to see what I do, you would see it also; it is probably there. Only the experience of madmen, drunkards, and dreamers is a more private one.*

* I have heard a well-authenticated account, which proved, in a curious complicated way, that what a man was accounted mad for seeing and hearing in vision he really did see and hear—the events were real in the experience of other people. All perceptions are indeed objective, i.e., present themselves as universally true, real for all, not only for myself. Is not the difference

Personally, I have little difficulty in admitting the doctrine of "telepathy," as put forward with judicial caution by the Literary Committee of the Psychical Society (Proceedings, July, 1884). For (as may be remembered by those who have happened to read my "Philosophy of Immortality") I must believe all perception to be the result of thought-transference, seeing that I hold external Nature to be the utterance, revelation, or ideal output of individual intelligences. As I cannot conceive of any existence other than in thought, or consciousness, integrating, and distinguishing sensations, things (i.e., percepts) ideas, or emotions, external Nature (therefore, the brain and body as part thereof) apart from our individual conception, or perception, can only be this.

Thought-transference is said by the Committee to account for apparitions at the moment of death, and that thesis is very ably argued, instances of various degrees of "visualisation," or externalisation being given in the stories collected, and carefully verified. The difficulty is that several persons may see the fully-developed apparition; and it is not easy to understand thought-transference from the dying person to all of them at once. Otherwise, we know that, by mesmerism, sensations and perceptions may be transmitted as well as thoughts, and thought is only a different degree of perception, all alike being ideal. Now what I wish to make clear is that in this theory of "telepathy," as explaining apparitions, the writers virtually admit the Spiritist hypothesis. Because they postulate the thought, or will, either deliberate, or "sub-conscious" (see the same essay) of the "agent," that is, the dying person, whose apparition is perceived. Now whether that agent effects the apparition to sense, primarily through mind, as they suppose, or affects mind primarily through sense (see their physiological diagram), surely makes but little difference, so far as the recognition of originating cause is concerned, though it is a serious question which version of the hypothesis best covers the facts; and I am disposed very decidedly to think that the Spiritist version best covers them. But in any case some person, intelligence, or "spirit," other than that of the percipient, effects the manifestation. The Psychical Research Society has not yet dealt with the case of apparitions after death, only with those of "phantasms of the living," and apparitions at the time of death. They have, I believe, collected sufficiently verified instances of the former, and I suppose, therefore, will soon deal with these.*

But when they do, how can they fail to postulate a similar cause for similar effects? If the apparition is due to the telepathic impact of a spirit, or person, in one case, why should a similar apparition be due to quite a different cause in another? And if mind, or spirit can operate through enormous distances, if space seems no obstacle to it, without apparent intervention of the normal organism—and the writers confess that no such physical mediation is in these instances apparent (they reject the "brain-waves" theory, I believe, where great distance intervenes)—why should it be thought incredible that the same mind, or spirit should operate when disengaged entirely from the visible body? In fact, thought and sympathy are presence. When I sleep and dream I am not present to the watcher, though my body is; I may be a thousand miles away, and, as is now established, may manifest my presence there not only to the mind of another, but even to his sense. And why? Because it is the spirit, mind, or thought, which makes the objective phenomenon or appearance to oneself, or other minds. The organism, the body, the identity is within the subject, not outside him, and therefore, he it is who imparts identity to the manifestation, or organic expression of himself in the external world of objects, so that he may be recognised, not only by his ideas and feelings, but even by his body, or outward appearance.

MR. JULIAN HAWTHORNE has just completed a new romance—a story of souls—in which a planchette is made to act the part of a medium between the world and certain spirits in the unseen. The story is written in the form of question and answer, and relates to a graphic account of a series of terrible events—murders, suicides, and madness. This class of novel, dealing with Spiritualistic subjects, seems to be on the increase.

between "true" and "false" perception only this—that in the former case we are in more harmony with the normal perceptions of those intelligences, in whose sphere we are ostensibly living at the time,—truth being the harmony of all thought? But on a different plane, so-called false percepts are true and common. The conscious plane may be partially dislocated, and then the result is confusing.

* Since writing this I see that Mrs. Sidgwick has done so in the May Journal; and I can only say that my own conclusion from the evidence adduced would be decidedly less evenly-balanced than hers.

WHAT IS SAID OF PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

J. H. FICHTE, THE GERMAN PHILOSOPHER AND AUTHOR.—"Notwithstanding my age (83) and my exemption from the controversies of the day, I feel it my duty to bear testimony to the great fact of Spiritualism. No one should keep silent."

PROFESSOR DE MORGAN, PRESIDENT OF THE MATHEMATICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.—"I am perfectly convinced that I have both seen and heard, in a manner which should make unbelief impossible, things called spiritual, which cannot be taken by a rational being to be capable of explanation by imposture, coincidence, or mistake. So far I feel the ground firm under me."

DR. ROBERT CHAMBERS.—"I have for many years known that these phenomena are real, as distinguished from impostures; and it is not of yesterday that I concluded they were calculated to explain much that has been doubtful in the past; and, when fully accepted, revolutionise the whole frame of human opinion on many important matters."—Extract from a Letter to A. Russell Wallace.

PROFESSOR HARE, EMERITUS PROFESSOR OF CHEMISTRY IN THE UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA.—"Far from abating my confidence in the inferences respecting the agencies of the spirits of deceased mortals, in the manifestations of which I have given an account in my work, I have, within the last nine months" (this was written in 1858), "had more striking evidences of that agency than those given in the work in question."

PROFESSOR CHALLIS, THE LATE PLUMERIAN PROFESSOR OF ASTRONOMY AT CAMBRIDGE.—"I have been unable to resist the large amount of testimony to such facts, which has come from many independent sources, and from a vast number of witnesses. . . . In short, the testimony has been so abundant and consistent, that either the facts must be admitted to be such as are reported, or the possibility of certifying facts by human testimony must be given up."—Clerical Journal, June, 1862.

PROFESSOR GREGORY, F.R.S.E.—"The essential question is this. What are the proofs of the agency of departed spirits? Although I cannot say that I yet feel the sure and firm conviction on this point which I feel on some others, I am bound to say that the higher phenomena, recorded by so many truthful and honourable men, appear to me to render the spiritual hypothesis almost certain. . . . I believe that if I could myself see the higher phenomena alluded to I should be satisfied, as are all those who have had the best means of judging of the truth of the spiritual theory."

LORD BROUGHAM.—"There is but one question I would ask the author, Is the Spiritualism of this work foreign to our materialistic, manufacturing age? No; for amidst the varieties of mind which divers circumstances produce are found those who cultivate man's highest faculties; to these the author addresses himself. But even in the most cloudless skies of scepticism I see a rain-cloud, if it be no bigger than a man's hand; it is modern Spiritualism."—Preface by Lord Brougham to "The Book of Nature," By C. O. Groom Napier, F.R.S.

THE LONDON DIALECTICAL COMMITTEE reported: "1. That sounds of a very varied character, apparently proceeding from articles of furniture, the floor and walls of the room—the vibrations accompanying which sounds are often distinctly perceptible to the touch—occur, without being produced by muscular action or mechanical contrivance. 2. That movements of heavy bodies take place without mechanical contrivance, of any kind, or adequate exertion of muscular force by those present, and frequently without contact or connection with any person. 3. That these sounds and movements often occur at the time and in the manner asked for by persons present, and, by means of a simple code of signals, answer questions and spell out coherent communications."

PROFESSOR BARRETT, F.R.S.E.—"I know and rejoice in the blessing Spiritualism has been to my own faith, and to that of several dear friends of mine. Moreover, I cordially recognise the fact that in bereavement and deep distress numbers have been cheered and consoled by the hope that Spiritualism has set before them. . . . So far from Materialism being true, I do not believe a single person has ever yet lived on this earth who has truly and heartily desired to know if an intelligent and personal existence be possible without our present bodily organism, and has steadily set himself to solve this supreme question with all the help he can gain from every source.—I say I do not believe any such earnest seeker after truth has ever failed to obtain a clear and definite answer in the affirmative."

CAMILLE FLAMMARION, THE FRENCH ASTRONOMER, AND MEMBER OF THE ACADEMIE FRANCAISE.—"I do not hesitate to affirm my conviction, based on personal examination of the subject, that any scientific man who declares the phenomena denominated 'magnetic,' 'somnambulic,' 'mediumic,' and others not yet explained by science to be 'impossible,' is one who speaks without knowing what he is talking about; and also any man accustomed, by his professional avocations, to scientific observation—provided that his mind be not biased by pre-conceived opinions, nor his mental vision blinded by that opposite kind of illusion, unhappily too common in the learned world, which consists in imagining that the laws of Nature are already known to us, and that everything which appears to overstep the limit of our present formulas is impossible—may acquire a radical and absolute certainty of the reality of the facts alluded to."

CROWWELL F. VARLEY, F.R.S.—"Twenty-five years ago I was a hard-headed unbeliever. . . . Spiritual phenomena, however, suddenly and quite unexpectedly, were soon after developed in my own family. . . . This led me to inquire and to try numerous experiments in such a way as to preclude, as much as circumstances would permit, the possibility of trickery and self-deception. . . . He then details various phases of the phenomena which had come within the range of his personal experience, and continues: "Other and numerous phenomena have occurred, proving the existence (a) of forces unknown to science; (b) the power of instantly reading my thoughts; (c) the presence of some intelligence or intelligences controlling those powers. . . . That the phenomena occur there is overwhelming evidence, and it is too late now to deny their existence."

ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, F.R.S.—"My position, therefore, is that the phenomena of Spiritualism in their entirety do not require further confirmation. They are proved, quite as well as any facts are proved in other sciences, and it is not denial or quibbling that can disprove any of them, but only fresh facts and accurate deductions from those facts. When the opponents of Spiritualism can give a record of their researches approaching in duration and completeness to those of its advocates; and when they can discover and show in detail, either how the phenomena are produced or how the many same and able men here referred to have been deluded into a coincident belief that they have witnessed them; and when they can prove the correctness of their theory by producing a like belief in a body of equally sane and able unbelievers—then, and not till then, will it be necessary for Spiritualists to produce fresh confirmation of facts which are, and always have been, sufficiently real and indisputable to satisfy any honest and persevering inquirer."—Miracles and Modern Spiritualism.

DR. LOCKHART ROBERTSON.—"The writer" (i.e., Dr. L. Robertson) "can now no more doubt the physical manifestations of so-called Spiritualism than he would any other fact, as, for example, the fall of the apple to the ground, of which his senses informed him. As stated above, there was no place or chance of anylegerdemain, or fraud, in these physical manifestations. He is aware, even from recent experience, of the impossibility of convincing anyone, by a mere narrative of events apparently so out of harmony with all our knowledge of the laws which govern the physical world, and he places these facts on record rather as an act of justice due to those whose similar statements he had elsewhere doubted and denied, than with either the desire or hope of convincing others. Yet he cannot doubt the ultimate recognition of facts of the truth of which he is so thoroughly convinced. Admit these physical manifestations, and a strange and wide world of research is opened to our inquiry. This field is new to the materialist mind of the last two centuries, which even in the writings of divines of the English Church, doubts and denies all spiritual manifestations and agencies, be they good or evil."—From a letter by Dr. Lockhart Robertson, published in the Dialectical Society's Report on Spiritualism, p. 24.

NASSAU WILLIAM SENIOR.—"No one can doubt that phenomena like these (Phrenology, Homeopathy, and Mesmerism) deserve to be observed, recorded, and arranged; and whether we call by the name of mesmerism, or by any other name, the science which proposes to do this, is a mere question of nomenclature. Among those who profess this science there may be careless observers, prejudiced recorders, and rash systematisers; their errors and defects may impede the progress of knowledge, but they will not stop it. And we have no doubt that, before the end of this century, the wonders which perplex almost equally those who accept and those who reject modern mesmerism will be distributed into defined classes, and found subject to ascertained laws—in other words, will become the subjects of a science." These views will prepare us for the following statement, made in the Spiritual Magazine, 1864, p. 336: "We have only to add, as a further tribute to the attainments and honours of Mr. Senior, that he was by long inquiry and experience a firm believer in spiritual power and manifestations. Mr. Home was his frequent guest, and Mr. Senior made no secret of his belief among his friends. He it was who recommended the publication of Mr. Home's recent work by Messrs. Longmans, and he authorised the publication, under initials, of one of the striking incidents there given, which happened to a near and dear member of his family."

WHAT CONJURERS SAY ABOUT PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

Mediums, who are the instruments of an external agency, have, more than once, been confronted with conjurers who deceive by sleight of hand; and in the same manner that no man of science who has thoroughly and fairly investigated the phenomena has failed to become convinced of their reality, so no conjurer who has been confronted with the same facts has been able to explain their occurrence by prestidigitation. Houdin, Jacobs, Bellachini, Hermann, Kellar, and others have already confessed their powerlessness to produce under the same conditions what occurs without human intervention in the presence of a medium.

Testimony of Robert Houdin.

The Marquis Endes de Mirville published during the lifetime of Houdin two letters from the latter, in his "Mémoire adressé à MM. les membres de l'Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques, sur un grand nombre de phénomènes merveilleux intéressant également la Religion, la Science, et les hommes du Monde," in which the conjurer confesses his inability to explain the phenomena he witnessed in the presence of Alexis, the clairvoyant. A circumstantial account is given of M. de Mirville's visit to Houdin for the purpose of engaging him in this investigation, of the latter's confidence in his own ability to detect the trick, and of what took place at the séance, the conditions of which were entirely under Houdin's control. This account extends over twelve pages, and its accuracy is confirmed by Houdin in the first of the documents now translated:—

"Although very far from accepting the enigmas which M. — is good enough to bestow upon me, and especially insisting that I am not at all committed to opinions, either in favour of magnetism or against it, I can, nevertheless, not refrain from declaring that the facts above reported are entirely correct (sont de la plus complète exactitude), and that, the more I reflect upon them, the more impossible I find it to rank them among those which belong to my art and profession.

"4th May, 1847.

ROBERT HOUDIN."

A fortnight later, M. de Mirville received another letter, in which the following, referring to another séance, occurs:—

"I have, therefore, returned from this séance as astonished as it is possible to be, and persuaded that it is utterly impossible that chance or skill could ever produce effects so wonderful (tout à fait impossible que le hasard ou l'adresse puisse jamais produire des effets aussi merveilleux).— I am, monsieur, &c.,

"May 16th, 1847.

(Signed) ROBERT HOUDIN."

Testimony of Harry Kellar.

Harry Kellar, a distinguished professor of legerdemain, investigated the slate-writing phenomena which occurred in the presence of Mr. Eglinton, at Calcutta, in January, 1882, and on the 25th of that month he addressed a letter to the editor of the Indian Daily News, in which he said:—

"In your issue of the 13th January I stated that I should be glad of an opportunity of participating in a séance with a view of giving an unbiased opinion as to whether, in my capacity of a professional prestidigitator, I could give a natural explanation of effects said to be produced by spiritual aid.

"I am indebted to the courtesy of Mr. Eglinton, the Spiritualistic medium now in Calcutta, and of his host, Mr. J. Mengens, for affording me the opportunity I craved.

"It is needless to say I went as a sceptic, but I must own that I have come away utterly unable to explain, by any natural means, the phenomena that I witnessed on Tuesday evening. I will give a brief description of what took place."

After describing several successful experiments, Mr. Kellar proceeds:—

"In respect to the above manifestations, I can only say that I do not expect my account of them to gain general credence. Forty-eight hours before I should not have believed anyone who described such manifestations under similar circumstances. I still remain a sceptic as regards Spiritualism, but I repeat my inability to explain or account for what must have been an intelligent force that produced the writing on the slate, which, if my senses are to be relied on, was in no way the result of trickery or sleight of hand."

On the 30th of the same month Mr. Kellar addressed another letter to the Indian Daily News, reporting some experiences of another kind with Mr. Eglinton, and regarding which he said:—

"In conclusion, let me state that after a most stringent trial and strict scrutiny of these wonderful experiences I can arrive at no other conclusion than that there was no trace of trickery in any form; nor was there in the room any mechanism or machinery by which could be produced the phenomena which had taken place. The ordinary mode by which Maskelyne and other conjurers imitate levitation or the floating test could not possibly be done in the room in which we were assembled."

The Testimony of Professor Jacobs.

Professor Jacobs, writing to the editor of Licht, mehr Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—

"Spite of the assertions, more or less trustworthy, of the French and English journalists, and spite of the foolish jealousies of ignorant conjurers, I feel it my duty to show up the bad faith of one party and the chicanery of the other. All that has been said or done adverse to these American mediums is absolutely untrustworthy. If we would rightly judge of a thing we must understand it, and neither the journalists nor the conjurers possessed the most elementary knowledge of the science that governs these phenomena. As a prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the medianistic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect.

"Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. If (as I have every reason to hope) the psychical studies, to which I am applying myself at this time, succeed, I shall be able to establish clearly, and that by public demonstration, the immense line of demarcation which separates mediumistic phenomena from conjuring proper, and then equivocation will be no longer possible, and persons will have to yield to evidence, or deny through predetermination to deny."

"Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also the individuality of the spirit in 'spiritual manifestation.' I authorise you, dear sir, to insert this letter in your next number, if agreeable to you," &c., &c.

Testimony of Samuel Bellachini.

Samuel Bellachini, Court Conjurer at Berlin, made the following declaration in December, 1877:—

"I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Berne; Butlerof, in St. Petersburg, to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the 'How' of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a notary and witnesses.

"Berlin, December 6th, 1877.

ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By "M.A. (Oxon.)."

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct séances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experiences in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two, of negative, passive temperament, and preferably of the female sex, the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each sitter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Scepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitter spirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear. Patience is essential, and it may be necessary to meet ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such a trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful séance.

The first indications of success usually are a cold breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twitchings of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not aiding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over, but not in contact with, it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if the attempt to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might disconcert an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will check noisy manifestations.

Lastly, Try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your reason. Do not enter into a very solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well-grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.

SPIRITUALISM AT HOME AND ABROAD: ITS PRESENT POSITION AND FUTURE WORK.

An Address delivered by the President of the London Spiritualist Alliance, at a General Meeting of the Society, held in St. James's Hall, London, on the 13th of November, 1885.

It falls to my lot as President to open to-night a new session of the London Spiritualist Alliance. In so doing, I propose to recount a chapter of history from the past, and to lay out some definite plan of operations for the future. I have no sensational incidents to narrate, no philosophical theories to propound, but if I can succeed in making clear by my recital a rather complex narrative, I have no doubt that what I shall set forth will be regarded as of high interest and importance.

In the first place, I must carry your minds back to a meeting of this Alliance, held in this room on July 15th, 1884, when the following resolution was unanimously agreed to:—

"That it be an instruction to the Council of the London Spiritualist Alliance to take steps for Confederation on a basis of equality with Societies interesting themselves in kindred subjects."

At that meeting I had submitted a scheme for an International Confederation of Spiritist Societies, which was adopted by the terms of this resolution, and referred to the Council for execution.

Recapitulation of Procedure.

After due consideration, it was thought desirable, as a preliminary step, that I should address a letter to the various societies throughout the world whose existence was known to us; that the plan should be brought under the notice of the various journals and organs of Spiritist opinion; and that an attempt should be made in this way to elicit the views of those interested in our proposal.

This letter was written and despatched in due course. It embodied the substance of the scheme which I had submitted, and I may at once say was everywhere received with a flattering amount of attention, and with the most courteous consideration, even in the few instances where entire agreement with its contents did not exist. From Paris, from Belgium, from the Hague, from Germany, from Hungary, from Italy, and from Switzerland, the Spiritists of the Continent of Europe responded to our proposal. The Victorian Association stretched out the right hand of fellowship from the Antipodes; the American Spiritualist Association wrote through its President "a hearty and fraternal response" to my letter; and the Spiritualists of far distant Brazil thought our proposals sufficiently important to induce them to formulate an elaborate and complex scheme for the purpose of giving practical effect to our general idea of confederation.

Now, it most unfortunately happened that just as replies to this letter began to come in I met with an accident which resulted in a tedious illness, from which I have but very recently recovered, so far as to be able to give attention to their contents. For more than six months I was not permitted, nor, indeed, was I able, to transact business. And as the process of recovery from an illness so prolonged was in itself tedious, so extreme care was necessary to avoid overtaking mental and nervous energy which had sustained so severe a shock. As a matter of necessity, therefore, I have only very recently been able to deal with the correspondence which my letter has brought me. This must be my excuse for what is a very regrettable, and what, in other circumstances, would be a quite unpardonable delay in dealing with the communications of my courteous correspondents.

Summary of Replies to Circular Letter.

I proceed to give as complete a summary as space permits of the history of the negotiations with various societies and of the opinions expressed by various representative writers. It will be seen that some known journals and societies are not represented in my list. It may, I fear, be possible that some letters addressed to me have been mislaid or lost during my illness. I have made search, however, and can find no further letters, though criticisms in foreign journals have more than probably escaped my notice.

To begin at the beginning I must refer to some correspondence with

The American Spiritual Alliance.

In September, 1883, the American Spiritual Alliance (President, Judge Nelson Cross), offered affiliation to our Society in a circular letter, and enclosed a certificate of membership.

"It is neither expected nor desired by the Alliance," so the words ran, "that all should think alike, nor indeed that any two should hold uniform opinions upon subjects, which in their limitless range embrace all that is known or attainable in the realm of material and spiritual resistance." Further: "It is no assumed position of leadership that the Alliance makes this effort to bring Spiritualist societies into closer relationship; and should this circular lead to the accomplishment of an object so manifestly desirable, it is its further design to furnish all societies in affiliation with a complete list of sister societies, thus completing its voluntary endeavours in the direction indicated, when it will resume its place as one of a common family with uniform rights and privileges as implied in its official maxim: 'Liberty and fraternity in unity.'"

On May 13th, 1884, at an annual meeting, President Nelson Cross announced that La Revue Spirite, Paris, had published this circular in full, together with the certificate of affiliation of the Société Scientifique du Spiritisme, founded by M. and Madame Allan Kardec in 1869.*

At the same time he gave a long list of American societies which had also exchanged affiliation certificates.

On December 3rd, 1883, President Nelson Cross wrote to me in a private letter as follows: "Every previous attempt in this country, as in yours, at anything akin to a uniform system of organisation amongst Spiritualists as a body has come to nought, not only because of a dislike to organisation per se, but because of the divers views amongst Spiritualists, individually, respecting matters which would necessarily have to be incorporated into any formulative plan of associated action."

It was this resistance to the formulation of anything which should bear even the faintest resemblance to a creed, which gave rise to the circular letter of our Alliance and the certificate of affiliation amongst organised societies which, I am glad to say, have met with general favour, and a number of societies widely separated from one another have embraced the proffered good fellowship and affiliated with one another, and the good work is continually going forward without opposition from any source.

The American Spiritualist Association.

In 1883 a convention of Spiritualists assembled at Sturgis, Michigan, and there formed an association to be known as the American Spiritualist Association. It was stated that:—

* An important notice of this Society was given by the late Professor Cassal in "LIGHT," July 19th, 1884, which may be reproduced as of interest here:—

"The Society founded by Allan Kardec, in 1855, consisted of a few seekers after truth. In 1857 the 'Livre des Esprits' appeared, and then in succession his other works, 'Le Livre des Médiuns,' 'Les Evangiles selon le Spiritisme,' 'Le Ciel et l'Enfer,' and 'La Genèse.' They have been translated into Spanish, Portuguese, Dutch, German, and English; there are Russian translations in manuscript, which are not yet permitted by the Russian Government to be published; a Greek translation, by M. Angelos Nicolaides, has been printed at Constantinople. Allan Kardec had correspondents in all countries, to whom he gave advice, but never dictated. They continue the same moral and amicable relations with us. Allan Kardec died March 31st, 1869. He contemplated the formation of a Société Anonyme et à Capital variable, in conformity with the French law of 1867, affecting societies; and his intention was carried out by his widow in 1869, seconded by some members of the former Society, with a capital of 40,000f. for 99 years. This Society has prospered, and now has a capital of 150,000f., under the title of the Société Scientifique du Spiritisme, having a library with books on its shelves of the value of 70,000f. and owning the Revue Spirite, a monthly journal founded by Allan Kardec, which has been brought out, even during the siege of Paris, without interruption. On the premises of the library is a hall, accommodating 300 persons. In this hall there is a meeting every Friday when foreign correspondence is read and answered; narratives of facts are listened to; discussion is held upon the motion of those present upon any matter introduced by the President of the meeting. After this séances are held for communications by writing and other mediums. Every Tuesday, in the same hall there are conferences or lectures on magnetism and Spiritism, séances of the school of magnetism, &c. After the séances of Tuesdays and Fridays, there is magnetic treatment by known healers of disorder. The Society has several lecturers whose travelling expenses it pays all over France, who support the theory of Spiritism, comment upon the scientific researches of our eminent savants, not forgetting those of Crookes, Wallace, Hare, Varley, Robert Dale Owen, Zollner, &c. In Belgium four lecturers are occupied at the principal Spiritist centres. There is a Fédération Franco-Belge et Latine keeping in union a vast number of Spiritists. Our Société Scientifique du Spiritisme makes no pretension to impose dogmas, to establish a creed, or create a sect; its basis is simply Spiritism: it believes in Reincarnation, but it thinks all Spiritualists are to be respected, whatever their belief; it regards as brethren all who have the desire to advance towards the light, who seek, while holding to the progress of modern science, to join to this science all that is revealed by our studies in Spiritism and Spiritism. Our Society considers that magnetism is the key which opens all the doors of the new science. We are eclectic, and greet every sincere friend of truth. We respect every circle, every society, not allowing ourselves to interfere in the least with their proceedings, unless our advice is asked in the collective name of the circle or society. In France there are Spiritists who prefer to be free students, who, nevertheless, find opportunities of scattering the seeds of truth around them. But we think that the work of circles is more effective. I have here given, as shortly as I can, a résumé of our work and doings.—P. G. LEYMARIE, Paris, July 9th, 1884"

"The objects and aims of this Association are to study Spiritualism in its scientific, philosophical, and religious aspects and uses, and to teach its truths as we learn them; to maintain high and pure principles on all vital questions of practical life and duty; to seek for the best spiritual culture and the most harmonious character."

In its address to the public, the Association said:—

"Surely the positive, practical knowledge of the continuous, organised, and individual life of man in an advanced sphere of being, is not beyond scientific demonstration; it is already demonstrated. It is for us and you to see to it that this knowledge shall become an efficient working factor in the world's growth towards a still higher and more harmonious estate in this our present condition."

The following observations on the same subject are taken from the Religio-Philosophical Journal, of Chicago, U.S.A.:—

"With the knowledge which comes to Spiritualists from the spirit world, there also come duties and grave responsibilities which must be met. If Modern Spiritualism cannot make the world better, then it had best be relegated to the place from whence it came. But it can and does work for righteousness in the highest meaning of that word, when properly used. Let Spiritualists see to it that it is so used. Let Spiritualists throughout the country unite in local and general organic work upon the platform of the American Spiritualist Association—improving that platform if it can be done—and a year will not elapse before the grand and beneficent results of such action will be apparent."

"We want no new religious sect, but we do want such co-operative effort as shall conserve the good in all religions, which shall give new impetus to all reforms by teaching reformers first principles, which shall utilise the science and philosophy of Spiritualism as solvents with which to separate truths from error and point the way to one universal brotherhood, whose motto shall be: 'Do all for others!'"

On December 21st, 1884, the President of this Association, Mr. John G. Jackson, writes to me and explains how, through illness and over-pressure, the proposal of confederation sent by the President of the London Spiritualist Alliance failed to be submitted to the annual meeting of the American Spiritualist Association at Lake Pleasant, and encloses some printed resolutions passed by the Executive Board, January 1st, 1885. Extract:—

"Resolved, that we, the Executive Board of the American Spiritualist Association, well knowing the feeling of our members, as often expressed on matters of co-operative effort, hereby offer brief but hearty and fraternal response to the suggestions of the London Spiritualist Alliance made through its President; and declare our willingness to confederate on the level of equality which it suggests, in working for the spread of truth on the basis defined and explained by it," &c.

Victorian Association of Spiritualists, Melbourne.

A brief letter from Mr. Terry is followed by a longer official one from the Hon. Sec., Mr. Charles H. Bamford, announcing that a resolution has been unanimously carried approving the scheme of confederation and authorising the committee to take steps to join it. He further states that he will be glad to receive practical suggestions for co-operation in the spread of Spiritualism.

He also gives some interesting particulars as to the state of Spiritualism in Melbourne. It seems that the Victorian Association has 140 members on its books; that it has a hall seating 1,600 people, where weekly religious services are held at which the average attendance during the past year had been 1,200. There are also, distinct from the Victorian Association of Spiritualists, three Children's Lyceums, with thirty teachers, and an average attendance of 256 scholars. This gives us a very interesting glimpse of the firm root that Spiritualism has struck in Australian soil, and of the practical work that is being done there.

Spiritualism in South America.

Señor Augusto Elias da Silva, writing from Rio Janeiro, tells me that there is among Spiritualists of Brazil a want of centralised union. Isolated groups of Spiritualists resist efforts at centralisation on account of minute divergencies of administrative detail. Consequently the Brazilian Spiritualist Federation is no longer all that its name implies. Such as it is, however, this Society warmly welcomes the project of a universal confederation; and recognising its vast importance, they will do all in their power to promote it.

Señor Cosmé Mariño also sends an important communication from Buenos Ayres. On November 14th, 1884, he wrote a long letter in Spanish, stating that although he does not anticipate any divergence of views, he is prohibited from taking any steps by the want of accurate information. "Spiritualism," he goes on to say, "is in its infancy. As a positive science it has demonstrated a single truth—the possibility of communion with the dead; while as a philosophy it has resuscitated innumerable speculations. For us it is neither possible nor permissible to confound a truth, which is demonstrated by methods which modern science approves, with ideas which the atmosphere holds in solution, so to speak, until the time is ripe for their embodiment." He then divides Spiritualists into two antagonistic schools: (1) "Those who, accepting the law of progress, and treating Spiritualism as a positive science, see in the fact of spirit intercourse a central ray of truth lighting up the past and the future; (2) those who ignore the law of progress, entrench themselves in codes and dogmas, and stifle the healthy germ of truth with the rites and formulae of dogmatic faith." He mistrusts creeds, dreads congresses, and desiderates absolute freedom and orderly development. He concludes an eloquent letter with an urgent appeal for information as to the exact constitution and objects of the London Spiritualist Alliance, without which he cannot act.

On April 30th, 1885, Señor Mariño writes a second letter in French, in which he states that the difficulties alluded to in his first letter have been dispelled by fuller information, and that, after consultation with several Spiritualists, he is able to submit the following scheme. If it receives approval he is to be authorised to form the kind of association described; at the same time he invites criticism on points of detail.

Bases and conditions upon which an association could be founded, to co-operate and harmonise (répondre aux tentatives) with the London Spiritualist Alliance.

The said association shall be exclusively co-operative with that of London, spreading its propaganda by the ways and means furnished by the International Confederation.

The co-operative association shall remit to London every month the sum of 8,000 francs—vingt-cinq mille francs—(£320) in acquittal of the following obligations which the London association shall discharge to us, viz., the international association shall send every year to Buenos Ayres a first-class medium (medium notable) for materialisation, direct writing, and physical phenomena in general, who, on arriving here, shall place himself at the disposal of the co-operative association, and combine with it in carrying out the best kind of propagandism.

It shall not be competent for the said medium to propagandise here for any sort of reward or remuneration. Neither shall the co-operative association compel him to do so for its own advantage.

The medium shall remain two months in Buenos Ayres, and shall give no séances except those pre-arranged with the co-operative association.

The expenses of residence at Buenos Ayres, as well as of conveying the medium to various places hereinafter to be named, shall be exclusively defrayed by the co-operative association.

The passage from Europe to Buenos Ayres, and the other expenses connected with sending the medium thither, shall be exclusively defrayed by the International Confederation.

The said Confederation will be responsible for sending thoroughly honourable and well-disposed mediums. Should the medium not fulfil the conditions, and should any fraud be discovered in his operations, from that moment the co-operative association would no longer feel bound to discharge the conditions stipulated in regard to him, and would abandon him to his fate, without being under the necessity of justifying its procedure to the International Confederation.

The co-operative society reserves to itself the right of sending the medium to Monte Video, capital of the Eastern Republic of Uruguay, and to Rosario, a town of the Argentine Republic, if the Spiritualists of these two towns have it not in their power to enter into direct relations with the International Confederation in London, and prefer to combine with the co-operative society of Buenos Ayres.

In addition to the above obligations, the International Confederation is bound to send monthly to the co-operative society an account (compte-rendu), in the form of correspondence, of the Spiritualist movement in Europe. There shall also be forwarded a sample of all the new works or scientific articles which shall appear in defence or assault of Spiritualism, and each mail should bring a sample of each of the Spiritualist journals or reviews published in London. The co-operative society shall likewise enjoy the other prerogatives which the statutes of the International Confederation confer.

I have been thus precise in giving the general outline of a scheme which the Council of the London Spiritualist Alliance is compelled, with regret, to put aside as impracticable under present conditions, because the very fact of its having been submitted shows how thoroughly in earnest Brazilian Spiritualists are: how they realise—and in this respect they offer to us a very brilliant example for our imitation—the opportunities of extending their knowledge, as well as the duties and obligations that its possession imposes on them; and lastly, how little disposed they are to make much of individual divergence in opinion, and how anxious, on the contrary, they show themselves to insist on the common faith which we all have. O si sic omnes!

Spiritualism in France.

M. de Rappard, Paris, writes: He does not belong to any Spiritist society in Paris, but he is ready to support the scheme in Licht, mehr Licht, of which he is director. His own rôle in life is to make Germany, his native land, familiar with the works of Allan Kardec. He is of opinion that Spiritist societies cannot succeed because they are composed of heterogeneous social elements. Domestic and friendly circles alone offer convincing phenomena. What end, then, do Spiritist societies serve, since the journals report manifestations, and the journals handle philosophical questions?

The Union Spirite Française aims at localising the other Spiritist societies of France. It had intended confining all efforts to France, thinking the times not ripe for wider operations. Nevertheless, it will welcome any serious Spiritist society which wishes to join in its efforts; and on its part will be willing to join a universal confederation with the single reservation that full information of its proposed regulations shall be given, and that the Union Spirite Française shall retain the management of French affairs. Accordingly a request is made for a copy of the statutes of the Confederation, as soon as it is constituted, whereupon a reply will be sent without further delay.

I have already quoted M. Leymarie's letter in "LIGHT," July 19th, 1884, and in this connection I may add the substance of one received from M. Greslez, Setif, Algiers. M. Greslez, who writes from the above address, is not a member of a circle, for his little town does not boast one, but he is in correspondence with a good many Spiritualists, and he is also a collaborateur of several Spiritist journals. If kept informed as to the scheme, he would support it with his writings, and endeavour to rouse French Spiritism from what he calls its present state of torpor.

Practical Spiritism in France is confined, he says, to the writing of journals by one-half of the community and their perusal by the other (an arrangement, it seems to me, of quite exceptional convenience and simplicity if those who write and criticise are willing to make a fair exchange and to allow themselves to be written about and criticised by their previous victims). There are few organised societies, and though there are some friendly groups (groupes intimes), their number is small owing to the want of mediums. He says: "M. Guérin has sacrificed much of his fortune to the institution of lectures. We have as yet only casual lecturers (conférenciers accidentels); we ought at least to have one who made it his sole occupation; and the further the distance, the warmer his welcome would be. We ought also to have some travelling mediums to accompany the lecturers. Both lecturers and mediums should be subsidised by the Confederation. In short, it is time to quit pure speculation. It is time for Spiritists and Spiritualists throughout the world to unite into a compact army, in order that by their fruits men may know with whom they have to reckon."

He adds that in France and Algeria all recognised cults are subsidised by the State and that Spiritists ought to apply for similar subsidies, to meet the expense of mediums, lecturers and libraries, but that this suggestion has been unfavourably received by most of his correspondents.

Spiritualism in Belgium.

On October 15th, 1884, the Brussels Moniteur announced the proposal of the London Spiritualist Alliance in a leading article for the due consideration of its readers. It anticipates the enthusiastic approval of Belgian Spiritists, quotes, with unmixed sympathy, the terms in which the objects and characters of the Confederation are defined, and gives vent to reflections, of a portion of which the following is a rough translation: "Materialist-Positivist Scepticism, coarse but useful and necessary instrument, comes to root out those false superstitions, harboured by the Church for its own aggrandisement; it comes to break down the barriers reared between nation and nation by religious sects which have soaked the earth with blood; it comes to prepare the way for Spiritists freed from the bondage of creeds, and ripe for a religion rooted in reason, marching abreast of Science, and making one electric chain of sympathy between all the peoples of the earth."

The matter will be laid before the Brussels societies, and reported on in due course.

M. Henrion, President of the Union Spirite Liégeoise, and director of the Phare, heartily applauds the idea, but having no knowledge of English asks for instruction as to the objects of the Confederation and its methods. He had himself done something in the same direction three years ago, but ceased, owing to the attacks of Parisian Spiritists. His society numbers eighty members. He also, seven years ago, founded the Union Spiritaliste, which numbers 120 members, and has communicated with them on this subject.

Spiritualism in Holland.

Madame Van Calcar, President of the Spiritualist Society of the Hague, writes:—

"The desire for organisation, now everywhere apparent, deserves conscientious attention. At the same time, we must not disguise the risk we run of premature action. It is true that we are all anti-materialist, but Spiritism itself is heterogeneous. The Atheist of yesterday is the Spiritist of to-day, and the Orthodox of to-day are the Spiritists of to-morrow. And how are we to create formule which shall harmoniously combine the Anglo-American Spiritist, the Latin Spiritist, and the Theosophist?"

"Then with regard to the state of Spiritism in Holland. The good seed sown by Swedenborg, when he printed his thick volumes in Amsterdam, was well watered by Jung Stilling, Lavater, and Oetinger. American Spiritism found a receptive soil in thousands of hearts weary of Calvinism and desolated by Materialism; and if my compatriots had not been alarmed and disgusted by the dogma of Re-incarnation, unhappily become synonymous with French Spiritism, the success would have been very great."

"Kardesian Spiritism is represented in Holland by two groups: (1) Amsterdam Veritas Society, President, Van Gülich, who publishes 'Les Feuilles Spirites'; (2) Arnhem, a group of Spiritists under President Plate, translator of Kardec's works."

"American Spiritism is represented by the journal On the Frontiers of Two Worlds, of which my husband is editor. The discussions are conducted by me in our house, as well as the séances for development of mediums, &c. For the study and practice of magnetism my brothers have formed a distinct society, under the presidency of M. Arthur Ragassi. I present you with our statutes, specially inviting your attention to the dispensary* for the magnetic treatment of the poor, which has been very successful. We have members in many towns, and our motto is 'Study and Experience.' As everything is done gratuitously, there is no regulation in matters of detail, and no administration. I incline to the opinion of Vincent de Paul, who, when asked to draw up a rule for works of charity, replied: 'As long as we have the spirit of charity there is no need of a rule; when the spirit of charity is departed we shall need a rule.'"

In fine, the writer points out that Spiritualism in Holland is not advanced enough to participate in a scheme, for which at the same time she evinces very warm sympathy. She will make a present of all the Dutch works on Spiritualism, and would like to exchange journals.

A. J. Riko, the Hague, writes to say that the society of which he was President has ceased work, after being in existence some twenty-two years. Spiritism in Holland, at present, he says, is chiefly confined to family circles, though there is in Amsterdam a society called Veritas. A few particulars are added, and personally the writer wishes well to the scheme, and would be glad to hear of its progress from time to time.

Spiritualism in Italy.

The Accademia di Studi Spiritici, Florence (President,

* In consequence of this remark, I am happy to say that I have received from Mr. James Regan (Lyddian House, Westbury-gardens, Clapham Park, London, S.W.) an offer which gives me hope and encouragement for the future. He desires to see a Metropolitan Spiritual Healing Infirmary to which he is willing to devote his own (psychical) powers, and to the support of which he offers a donation of £100. A few more such self-sacrificing and generous helpers in various departments of urgent work would enable us to work wonders.

Cavaliere Sebastiano Fenzi), a young society, of some sixty members, has resolved unanimously to join the Confederation. They propose to establish a friendly intercourse for the exchange of views and experiences, which intercourse will gradually ripen into intimacy, and culminate eventually in a vast society of Spiritualists throughout the world. The members of this society are emancipated from all dogma, and believe in Christianity as it was preached by its Founder. They have several physical mediums, as well as some writing mediums of considerable power; but they have no trance mediums, and have never been able to obtain visible materialisation.

Spiritualism in Switzerland.

M. Auguste Vodoz, Geneva, writes in effect: With regard to the project itself for an "International Confederation" of Spiritists and Psychologists all over the world, he is in entire sympathy with it. Its realisation would fill him with joy. He accordingly sends his adhesion.

As to the means for carrying it out, he is in favour of convoking a congress at Geneva itself for 1885 or 1886, in which the fundamental principles of the projected International Confederation could be arranged. It would no doubt be necessary in the first place to appoint a provisional committee of Initiative, which could be composed entirely of persons residing in London, or in Paris, or again at Geneva, and which would be authorised to study the ways and means most calculated to ensure the success of the congress. He ends by saying "I am at your disposal, as well as my journal."

Spiritualism in Germany and Hungary.

Baroness Vay writes to announce the adhesion of herself and Baron Vay, together with that of the Society Spiriter Forscher, Budapest. This adhesion is coupled with the proviso that no fee is required, seeing that the Society consists of poor members, and has difficulty in keeping together. They take for basis of belief the works of Allan Kardec, and two works by Baroness Vay. They embrace the teachings of Christ and eschew Occultism.

The President of the Society, Dr. Adolphe Grünhut, also writes a formal letter of acceptance, heartily approving the scheme, stating their numbers, fifty-one regular and forty-seven honorary members, and asking for news.

Adolf Madach writes, lamenting the non-existence of any Hungarian society (Spiriter Forscher is German), and deploring the Kardecian tenets of the Spiriter Forscher. He favours Anglo-American experimental Spiritism, and, though he lives aloof from Hungarian centres of civilisation, his pen is not idle.

A Proposed Congress.

Of the various proposals set forth in these letters, the suggestion that a Congress or Convention should be convoked is one which is, in the judgment of the Council, premature. The plan of confederation must be settled in a less public manner, and criticised and amended in the light of practical experience before public discussions upon its details can profitably be held. It may well be in the near future that the interchange of opinion and the record of experience, philosophical disquisitions on moot points, and a free exposition of theories that commend themselves to various minds, may render such congresses valuable and useful to us as they are found to be in other departments of science. They would give us a common meeting-place: would familiarise us with the differences of opinion on minor matters that are perfectly consistent with unanimity of belief in matters essential: would broaden our views, and knock off obtrusive angularities: all things much to be desired. But this state of things must grow out of less ambitious proposals; it would be unwise and dangerous to attempt prematurely to force it on.

Cavaliere Sebastiano Fenzi's View.

The view taken by Cavaliere Sebastiano Fenzi is more in harmony with what is possible for us in our present condition, and closely in accord with the propositions laid down in the address to this Alliance ("LIGHT," July 19th, 1884) when this plan was first formulated. The Society of which this gentleman is President, proposes "to establish a friendly intercourse for the exchange of views and experiences, which intercourse will gradually ripen into intimacy, and culminate eventually in a vast Society of Spiritualists throughout the world." This more modest proposal harmonises fully with the general tenor of my address in July, 1884. I proposed as something to look forward to, and to aim at, "a grand confederation between societies of repute in various countries, in defence and for the advancement of the central principles of our common faith"—a faith that I declared to be "in direct and uncompromising opposition to the Materialism of the age"—a faith which I embodied in the following propositions:—

1. That there is a life coincident with, and independent of, the physical life of the body.
2. That, as a necessary corollary, this life extends beyond the life of the body.
3. That there is communication between the denizens of that state of existence, and those of the world in which we now live.

A spiritual life, the complement of physical existence, uninterrupted by physical death; and a communion between the world of spirit and the world of matter,—this, in a nutshell, is my faith as a Spiritualist.

On this platform, from which the much-dreaded creed and dogma is conspicuously absent, and which is broad enough to hold Spiritualists, Spiritists, and all who concern themselves in any way with the phenomena or the philosophy of what is broadly called Spiritualism, except a class to whom I will presently allude,—on this platform I conceive confederation to be possible in a way that it will not be difficult to define. I have stated the results that I anticipate from such union in words that I may be permitted to repeat.

"As time goes on and our feelers are more and more widely extended, the Committee is not without hope that there may spring up an International Alliance between Spiritualists of all countries. There is between us no difference of opinion as to our broad facts. We are agreed on the salient articles of our common faith. On that broad and substantial basis it should be possible to organise a grand Alliance which should include within its all-embracing arms representatives from every nation, whose presence on its Council should testify to the fact that the belief and practice which belongs to us as Spiritualists is concerned with the true interests of our common humanity, and is bound, therefore, to take note of and to protect them.

"Were this realised as the final aim that we should have in view—an organisation of infinite ramifications, whose aim should be to promote the highest and best interests of mankind, and to advance their spiritual welfare here and hereafter—it would be clear to all of us that Spiritualists have laid upon them a serious and solemn charge, and that that charge can only be carried into real effect by such an organisation as I have indicated."

A Comprehensive Platform.

I have said that this platform is broad enough for all who concern themselves with things occult, psychical, spiritualistic, except, perhaps, one class. The fact, established for the Spiritualist, of a possibility of communion between the world of spirit and the world of matter differentiates him from those whose philosophy does not admit of such a conception. In view of recent speculations with which the air is thick, this special point is rapidly becoming the distinguishing note of a Spiritualist. I have no desire to catch any cheap applause in a meeting largely composed of Spiritualists, by attacking the opinions of any set of investigators of the phenomena with which we are concerned. But it is necessary to say that by virtue of the belief that we hold, we are not content with theories, which not only lamentably fail to explain the facts that we observe, but which seem to be expressly framed to explain away the only reasonable and complete explanation of which, in our opinion, they are susceptible. While we view with interest, if also with no great faith in the permanent value of the results obtained, all attempts to extend the existing area of human science in the direction of psychical facts, we yet consider that the hypotheses of Telepathy and the Unconscious Secondary Self, on the one hand, limp haltingly after facts which they will never overtake. The hypotheses of Professor von Hartmann—his implantation and transference of objective hallucinations; his masked somnambulism; his almost omniscient somnambulant consciousness; and his almost omnipotent mediumistic nerve-force, seem to us quite inadequate to do the work of spirit which, as a theory, they are intended to displace. They are interesting speculations; filmy cobwebs of the brain; expedients of a philosopher whose philosophy has no room, so far as I can see after careful study, for spirit, though Dr. von Hartmann thinks it has; a philosophy which, in its author's own words, holds "the survival of the personally conscious spirit after death to be very improbable." We do not think that this theory covers the facts—to borrow a familiar illustration, "It is not strong enough for the place"—and its author would soon discover that to be the case if he had any personal experience whatever of the facts with which he seeks to deal.

From the holders of such theories, in so far as they rest in them to the exclusion of all impact of the world of spirit on the world of matter, we are differentiated by our distinctive belief.

Otherwise we are responsible for no man's private opinions—"the fringes that adorn, or possibly that sometimes embarrass and encumber the fabric of essential truth." Within our Confederation there will be room for very divergent views; and we shall hope for no little benefit from the free expression of opinion, and the possible modification of any erroneous views that we may have too hastily adopted.

Spiritualism in all Lands.

I must not delay, for much yet remains to be said; but I cannot forbear to point out how this correspondence illustrates the extent of the hold which Spiritualism in these few decades, less than a short half-century, has gained upon mankind. It has spread, we see even by this correspondence, into four continents, and exists in organised form wherever men concern themselves with their future life, on lines of experimental investigation rather than on those of traditional belief; wherever liberty of thought and freedom of opinion flourish; in every land where a censor of men's thoughts is not sufficiently unscrupulous to suppress an unwelcome and inconvenient expression of opinion—Russia is the only country I know of where the publication of a Spiritualist journal is impossible, and even that benighted land seems to be improving; and it has this boast, which is as unique as its rapid and wide growth, that among the master-minds that it has attracted, none has, in all these years, in all these countries, repudiated a belief that has been founded on personal investigation and experiment.

This widespread dissemination of a belief which no votary abandons, and of which the philosophy of the Spiritualist is, in the enormous preponderance of opinion, satisfactorily explanatory, is a phenomenon without parallel, so far as I know, in the history of the world.

Something Worth the Doing.

It will be something worth the doing to make some efforts, however tentative, to consolidate these widespread organisations, to give them a coherent bond of union, to bring home to each member of them, in whatever distant land, that he is one of a great family that knows no distinctions of race, or clime, or creed, but is continuous with humanity itself. As our lamented friend Professor Cassal once put it, "It will be a grand thing if by our efforts in this direction we help forward the idea of the brotherhood of nations." That will be a great factor in human progress which we shall set in action, if we can bring home to all men that knowledge is a priceless possession, involving as the price of high truth the performance of high duties. I hope, without unnecessary delay, to be able to present to the Society some matured scheme by which the general objects that I have indicated may be carried into effect.

What are We Doing?

But this thought—that knowledge involves responsibility, and that "high duties are incumbent on the possessors of high truth," leads me to turn my attention to our own Society, and its work.

What are we doing? I will not hesitate to say that, though we are doing perhaps as much as our means permit, we are not doing enough. I believe that an active plan of work, zealously carried out, would enlist with us some who now stand aside, perhaps in expectation of some more definite action on our part. I believe also that it is incumbent upon this Spiritualist Alliance to take a lead in some definite attempt to extend the area of our knowledge by organised experimental research, and to lay broad and firm the foundations for the faith that is in us. The methods of investigation have too often been faulty. It is our duty to do what we can to amend them, to direct effort, to contribute of our experience, to guide the ignorant and inexperienced in the difficult path of personal experimental research.

Old Methods of Investigation.

When in November, 1882, the educated Spiritualists of Great Britain pronounced with such striking unanimity against methods of investigation which experience had shown to be disastrous, especially against promiscuous circles held in total darkness, and against the seclusion of the medium in a dark cabinet, a heavy blow was given to methods of investigation which should never have been sanctioned: methods of inquiry into an obscure and unknown subject, devised apparently to produce the maximum of bewilderment with the minimum of knowledge, while offering at the same time the most comprehensive facilities for fraud. From that blow the old bad method of investigation—if, indeed, that title could ever be applied to it—has never recovered. Some of our most valuable records of evidence, e.g., in materialisation and in psychography, have been obtained in full light, and with the medium in full view.

The Time of Construction has Come.

We have practically destroyed what led to grave abuses. It is now incumbent on us to take a step forward in the direction of construction. We must do what we can to afford facilities for inquiry into, and observation of, the phenomena and facts on which we rely by any reasonable and rational methods. We must meet the great and growing demand for guidance and instruction that now presses with such unequal force on a few known individuals. We must ensure, if we can, tender, delicate, and careful treatment of our mediums, as instruments the accuracy and value of which largely depend on the treatment to which they are subjected. We must see to it that our circles are so guarded as to be inaccessible to the merely ignorant who desires only to air his ignorance and not to diminish his stock by acquiring knowledge; to the prejudiced who only cherishes his prejudices; to the mere wonder-hunter who has no higher motive than a shallow curiosity to know what this new thing may be. We must learn to graduate our circles so that the neophyte shall not be at once admitted to the inner mysteries, but shall find his suitable sphere of observation where he may grow in knowledge till he fitly takes his place among the experts. We must try to secure such mature knowledge amongst the contributors to the Spiritualist Press as shall prevent the advocacy and defence of our beliefs, and the exposition of our facts from falling into indiscreet and incompetent hands. We must steadily aim at raising the value of the records, discussions, and disquisitions which those who are able should feel it a duty to contribute to the general fund of knowledge.

Such, in brief outline, is the work, onerous, important, and comprehensive, which seems to the Council in whose name I speak to be now forced upon Spiritualists. It is high time that it should be taken in hand. How can we best approach it?

The Constructive Work of this Alliance.

First of all, the Council is of opinion that this Alliance of Spiritualists is the most suitable body to undertake it. It includes within it most of the experienced Spiritualists of early days, together with a considerable number of earnest and able investigators of the new epoch. Experts and inquirers are ready to our hand. How can we utilise the experience of the one class, and answer the cravings for knowledge which are increasingly importunate in the other? We must apply the experimental method on lines at which I have already hinted. Our circles must be properly graduated and duly controlled.

The plan of practical research that I am about to lay before you and for the draft of which (in some ways but not materially modified by subsequent consideration) we are indebted to Mr. J. S. Farmer, Editor of "LIGHT," and a member of the governing body of this Alliance, has been thoroughly discussed by the Council of the Alliance, and has received its sanction and approval. Indeed, I may say that it is in working order, and that I have already received the names of some inquirers who are actually engaged in investigation, as well as of several mediums who are willing to give their time and powers in furtherance of the plan.

Graduated Circles.

Circles will be graduated so as to be resolved into two classes, of which there may be various grades and any number of groups.

(1) CIRCLES OF INQUIRERS.

(2) CIRCLES OF EXPERTS.

All groups of circles of whatever degree will be subject absolutely to the direction and governance of a CENTRAL COMMITTEE OF CONTROL. All who desire to take part in these circles will give in their names to me, and I shall submit them to the Central Committee. The election is by ballot; and it is obvious that great care must be exercised in the selection of suitable persons, and their arrangement in circles, so composed as to secure perfect harmony. These various circles will meet, each at its own convenience, in private houses for the most part, and their proceedings will be strictly private. They will be conducted by a Director elected in each circle by the members; and accurate minutes of all proceedings will be kept by a Recorder. These minutes will be submitted at stated intervals to the Committee of Control, who alone will decide as to their publication. No publication will be permissible without the sanction of the Committee; and from its decision there is no appeal. Each member of the various circles pledges himself to keep all proceedings strictly private until authority is given for publication: and the names of the persons who constitute a particular circle are known only to themselves and to the Committee of Control.

A circle should not consist of more than ten or twelve members, and the control of its proceedings is vested in its Director, as the minutes of them are the charge of its Recorder. The minutes are to be read and verified at the opening of each meeting.

Circles of Inquirers

will consist of persons who have been elected by ballot, and who have pledged themselves to some prolonged and thorough course of investigation. It will, for obvious reasons, be very necessary to sift out the merely curious, as well as those who approach the subject from a standpoint of dogmatic antagonism, and to select with caution those only who are not mere enthusiasts, but sane, level-headed, and tenacious of their purpose. Such persons, when elected, will be put in communication with some expert who will give the necessary advice and guidance; will direct their reading, if required; will give help in difficulty, and generally act as Mentor and sponsor to them, until, in due time, they become fit to take their place in a circle of experts, and to do for others what has been done for them.

I have said that the proceedings of each circle of inquirers will be under the charge of its Expert Director. But it is clearly undesirable and practically impossible to interfere with what the invisible operators do. An expert would know that such interference would be disastrous, and would confine himself to such management of the affairs of the circle as may from time to time be necessary to facilitate its investigation.

Circles of Experts

will engage in the study of some special group of phenomena as opportunity serves. To them we shall look for the development of the best conditions of observation; for experiments which could not safely be made in a less harmonious circle, or by less experienced persons; for light on perplexing problems; for increase of our store of knowledge by their more minute observation and study under conditions better than most of us can attain to. Each circle will naturally select its sphere of work, and devote itself to practical and experimental research in the best and most thorough manner that is open to it.

Pledges to be Required.

Those who wish to take part in this work will not refuse to pledge themselves

1. To an ungrudging assistance, within reasonable bounds, to any fellow-member who may be assigned to them for guidance.
2. To sink absolutely any personal feeling when the progress of the Alliance or the benefit of its members is at stake.
3. To obey, and submit to the reasonable control, of the Central Committee, which is charged with the administration of this plan, and to preserve a faithful reticence as to any results obtained in any circle, until the records are published by order of that Committee.

No expression of opinion as to theories which may be held to account for observed facts, no acceptance of any special form of belief will be sought from any inquirer. It is, however, a fact that the Central Committee of Control views psychical facts from a Spiritualist point of view, though it is by no means bound down to any one view, and may, indeed, receive and canvass any theories proposed by inquirers; and the Spiritualist Alliance, as its name implies, is, as a body, professedly Spiritualistic.

Central Committee of Control.

It was deemed by the Council that the constitution of the Committee of Control, beyond the fact of my own presence on it, should be secret. It was necessary that some individual should set the plan in action, and the Council considered that it was preferable that I who have propounded it should also carry it into effect. I consented, so far as time and strength permit, to accept this responsibility. I shall associate with myself from time to time such Spiritualists of ripe experience as may be willing to give me the benefit of their counsel. I will not inflict on them the annoyance of unnecessary publicity, nor expose them to any danger of incurring the onus of a correspondence which has weighed on me for many a long year, nor will I place them in the invidious position of having added to their reasonable duties the unreasonable burden of listening to grievances, real or imaginary, that may conceivably be in men's minds. Therefore, though I detest unnecessary secrecy and mystery, I am of opinion that judicious reticence is desirable, and I will be bold enough to say that the names of my colleagues on the Central Committee of Control are not public property. Applications should be sent to me, and by me they shall be submitted for ballot. I will communicate the result; and no undue publicity shall be incurred. I must trust to the generous confidence which has always been shown to me by those with whom

I count it an honour to be associated, to continue that confidence to me in carrying out this plan. I am deeply impressed with the paramount necessity that the management and control of this work should be in the hands of men of discretion and experience, and I will exercise all care so to select my colleagues that the constitution of the Committee shall be such as would inspire confidence in the public mind, if its constituent elements were known.

Funds, and Remuneration of Mediums.

One or two points of detail remain to be stated.

While the members of the various circles will, of course, be already, or will ipso facto become members of the London Spiritualist Alliance, it will further be expected that they contribute a guinea annually to the working expenses incurred in this plan of research. It will be very desirable that we should have funds at our disposal; and the Committee will be prepared to receive and administer any donations that may come in beyond the fees of members of the various circles.

It is hoped that this plan of work, when fully developed, may have the effect of opening private circles to those qualified observers who have given proof of their earnestness, integrity, and fitness; and that the introduction of the Committee of Control may act at home or abroad as an "Open Sesame" in favour of a properly-recommended observer.

It is not proposed to offer any remuneration to those mediums who volunteer their services to the various circles. It is not to be denied that the complete elimination of the element of money, at least in the shape of payment for separate sittings, will remove a source of difficulty. Though I hold strongly that the labourer is worthy of his hire, I cannot deny that this same hire, under the old methods of investigation, has been a stumbling-block and cause of offence. For the time I am glad, by the generous aid of mediums, to get rid of it, though I hope that the rapid growth of our Research Fund will enable us, not indeed to make payment to mediums by results, at so much a head, or so much an hour, but to place a medium beyond the reach of such temptation, by endowing him with such a sum as shall justify us in monopolising his powers, and claiming them for our exclusive use. In this way we shall get a very doubtful element out of our calculations, and shall form the nucleus of a School of the Prophets where mediumship will be developed under proper conditions; where the medium will be guarded from harm; and where we may reasonably expect to learn much that as yet we have had no opportunity to study.

But this is in the distant future. In the immediate present I am thankful to announce that I have the promise of the free assistance of six mediums who have placed themselves at the service of the Committee. Our warmest thanks are due to them for this bright example of self-sacrificing zeal.

Is a Religious Service Desirable?

It may possibly be that out of this plan may come some more direct provision for the spiritual wants of our members than we have yet been able to make. Some of us desire very much that there should be some available form of religious service expressive of our faith, which we could attend for worship, for instruction, perhaps for direct and elevated communion with those who have gone before. It is an aspiration that no one can speak of in terms other than those of respect. I tried some time since to organise such meetings, but I arrived at the conclusion that there were grave difficulties in the way, and that the time was not yet come for such a step. Whether the time has yet come when the difficulties may be surmounted, I will not venture to say.

The Conclusion of the Whole Matter.

It remains only that I should endeavour to place before you a summary view of what I trust may result from the prosecution of the plan that I have now inadequately expounded. Much must depend on the zeal, the energy, the discretion, and the perseverance of those who assume responsibility in carrying it into execution. No dilettante dabbler will be of any service either to himself or to us. No man who sees everything through a veil of prejudice, whether that prejudice be enlisted on the side of our beliefs (as is the case with the mere enthusiast on whom rational argument is wasted) or against us, in the shape of dogged and invincible scepticism, will advance what we desire to prosecute. The man of open mind, who can view facts in their relations, and can regard them with equanimity, to whatever end they draw him; the man who is not thrown off his balance by a bold theory boldly propounded, but resting on nothing more substantial than air; the unbiassed student of an obscure and occult group of phenomena which have not yet received from friend or foe a perfectly calm and dispassionate attention—these are the people we want.

To them I respectfully say: There is already accumulated a vast mass of observed fact, of various degrees of importance, more or less accurately recorded. The study of this mass of evidence will yield interesting results to a careful student, and will probably lead him to the conclusion that what is therein stated is of the highest importance, even if it also lead him to the verge of despair in view of the general looseness and inaccuracy of the records, and of the diversity of the conclusions based upon them. These facts are occurring in our midst to-day. Let it be our work to deal with them in a more sober and serious spirit, in a manner more in accord with the truly scientific spirit of the age. Science (falsely so called, in this connection) has done its best to burke them, to explain away their true significance, to relegate them to the limbo of superstition. Let us shame Science by dealing with them scientifically!

If we only deal fairly with the facts and are not carried away by ill-regulated enthusiasm or fettered by an unbending scepticism, I anticipate from the plan that I now leave with you results such as these:—

1. The encouragement of exact methods of research.
2. The encouragement of more exact records of observed facts.
3. The due regulation of admission to circles, so that the elements of which they are composed will be more homogeneous.
4. The graduation of circles, so as to afford a complete and progressive course of investigation and instruction.
5. The more careful treatment of mediums.
6. The development of an increased number of experts who may relieve the few of the burden now laid upon them.
7. Some better material for our Spiritualist Press derived from a larger area of experience more exactly tabulated.
8. Increased usefulness of this Alliance.

But, whatever the outcome of what is, at any rate, a well-considered plan, the work presses. It lies at our doors, and we cannot rid ourselves of the responsibility of accepting or refusing its acceptance. For we bear the burden of the age in which our lot is cast:—an age of strenuous activity, of incessant change, of rapid development, of ceaseless questioning of venerable beliefs:—an age of the shaking of dry bones, of the birth of new truth, of the reconstruction of old beliefs, of nobler aspirations, and of deeper insights:—an epoch that any true man with his mind awake may be deeply thankful to have lived and acted in, even though he be not at all times in harmony with its prevailing spirit; but an epoch also that will be to him a veritable touchstone, proving him with inevitable certainty what manner of man he is: whether alive to his opportunities, awake to his responsibilities, conscious of his high duties, or only enwrapped in selfish and inglorious ease, careless of the real import of what tickles his jaded curiosity, careful only to eat and to drink, and on the morrow dropping into the grave where he and his acts will be alike forgotten.

A vote of thanks proposed by one of the most recent converts and seconded by one of the oldest Spiritualists—Mr. Newton Crosland—was carried by acclamation and received due acknowledgment from the President.

HYPNOTISM.—On this subject Dr. Reigner has been delivering a lecture before the Société Scientifique du Spiritisme of Paris. The term, "Hypnotism," is from the Greek hypno, to sleep. It is commonly spoken of here as originating with Mr. Braid, an English surgeon. Of him the eminent magnetiser, M. Lafontaine, wrote: "Mr. Braid, after witnessing some experiments at one of my lectures at Manchester, thought to make himself a name as a discoverer of something new and an exposé of what he called the fallacy of supposing the existence of a force or fluid from the magnetiser acting upon the subject; and he, as he said, caused subjects of a nervous kind to hypnotise themselves by gazing fixedly at something fixed before and above their eyes. But the knowledge of such phenomena as he induced by this process, and the application of it, under his very term Hypnotism, in the treatment of nervous affections, was known and published before his time by Dr. Pierry, of the Faculty of Medicine of Paris, who wrote in his work, 'La Médecine du Bon Sens': 'The effect of a shining object, or of an object in monotonous motion, upon the gazing sight, gives rise, in neuropathic subjects, to hypnotic phenomena; it induces a singular state of the brain in which there is stupor and insensibility to physical impressions, at the same time that the intellectual organs retain their excitability by impressions upon the nerves of hearing.'" Dr. Reigner stated Pierry's theory based upon thirty years' study and observation of the facts of magnetic and hypnotic somnambulism.

MR. MYERS ON HUMAN PERSONALITY.

By DR. GEORGE WYLD.

Mr. Myers recently read a paper on the above subject before the Society for Psychical Research, an epitome of which paper appeared in last week's "LIGHT," the subject in its complete form being given in the current number of the Fortnightly Review.

In this paper Mr. Myers attempts to show that his recent studies in hypnotism "have led in the first place to certain negative results which, so far as they go—and that is very far—do at least appear directly to contravene those very [Spiritualistic] conclusions which he holds as so uniquely important."

In the above paragraph I state Mr. Myers' position regarding the import of certain hypnotic phenomena in his own words; his conclusions being that these phenomena go towards throwing doubts on the persistent or immortal personality of the human soul.

As there are some of us who have been willing to risk reputation, and even almost life itself, in devotion to Spiritualistic studies, because we think that through these only can we arrive at that true Science of the Soul whereby we can demonstrate its triumph over death and the grave—the agnostical conclusions arrived at by Mr. Myers might give cause of trouble, were it not that it can be most distinctly seen that his conclusions are not in any degree warranted by his facts.

The argument which universally appeals to the common-sense of mankind is, that our continuous memory assures us beyond all doubt that the conscious Ego, of say, 1850, is the same conscious Ego of 1885. But Mr. Myers thinks that, because certain hypnotic experiments can apparently break the chain of the continuous memory, by substituting the will of the external experimenter, the memory of the Ego may thus be interrupted at any number of points, and the entire chain thus broken into any number of disconnected links, the Ego being nowhere.

On examination, however, it will be found that the Ego is homogeneous, and cannot be disintegrated, and that any disintegration which takes place is only the disintegration of the machine through which the Ego works on the physical plane.

In illustration of his view, Mr. Myers proceeds to give a few elementary experiments in hypnotism, the strongest of which I now give in an abbreviated form, accompanied by a brief analysis, by which, I think, it can be easily shown that Mr. Myers has no foundation whatever, in the facts presented, for his agnostical conclusions.

Case 1.—A subject is hypnotised and then informed that his name is Nebuchadnezzar. He replies, "It is so," but adds, "I only say so to oblige you." The operator then requests him to act independently and tell him what his name really is, when he hesitates, but still answers "Nebuchadnezzar," and when awakened he says, "I thought I might as well call myself by that name as by any other."

In this instance we have no break in the personality, but simply a credulous being "biologised" by a stronger will, and induced by the will of the operator to oblige him by the exhibition of any tom-foolery he may desire. It is simply an illustration of the willing game, and the sensitive proves his personality by his willingness to oblige his master.

Case 2.—A young lady is hypnotised, and then told that blue is the prettiest colour for bricks, and when awakened she resumes the painting of a diagram upon which she had been engaged, and when she comes to paint the bricks she says to her lady companion, "I suppose it would never do to paint these bricks blue?" and when asked "Why blue?" she replies, "The childish idea is in my mind."

This instance in no degree suggests the loss or interruption of personality, but only shows an amiable desire to gratify the operator; the influence of his persuasion being transmitted from her semi-tranced to her waking state; and here again the transmission of the idea, proves the unity of the Ego.

Case 3.—It is suggested to a hypnotised subject in a hospital that when awake he shall take Dr. X.'s umbrella, open it, and walk up and down the gallery. Accordingly, he does so, and when asked why he so acts, replies, "it is just a fancy; I sometimes take a walk."

This case is the same as the last, and is another illustration of the willing game. In no degree does it support the disintegration of the Ego, but on the contrary shows the transmission of the idea from the dreaming to the waking Ego, and thus proves the unbroken personality.

Case 4.—A. is hypnotised on the 14th July, and is then told that on the 1st January following, her hypnotiser B. will pay her a visit, wish her a happy new year, and then disappear. Accordingly, A., being in her chamber on the appointed day, hears a knock, and says, "Come in," when in walks B., dressed in the summer clothes he wore 14th July, and says, "A happy new year to you," and then disappears.

This is a very interesting case, and may possibly be an illustration of the phenomenon of the Double, or it may be a case of will transmitted from a distance, but otherwise it can be as easily explained as the other cases.

A. received an announcement in her semi-trance state, which announcement dwelt in the spirit memory, and was delivered to the waking mind by impression so strongly that the brain-action projected the objective appearance of B.

In no degree does this case show any disintegration of the personality, but it goes to prove that the true personality is the inner spiritual self.

Having given these and other similar cases, Mr. Myers then adds: "These brief hints must suffice for the present to indicate that memory as we know it cannot prove the personality of men." But, as we have seen, these illustrations bring us to no such conclusion; and that Mr. Myers should be so easily satisfied with his proofs is a matter for surprise.

Mr. Myers further adds: "Our idiosyncratic reactions to special stimuli form, as we have seen, the organic basis of what we call the will."

This sentence is as obscure as almost any passage in Browning, but in this case, at least, I think we must not mistake obscurity for depth; for when the purple mists are dispersed which disguise the meaning, there will be exposed only a naked materialism. And I feel sure of this, that the words in no sense whatever explain the mechanism of the will or soul.

On the other hand, I entirely agree with Mr. Myers when he says, speaking of the aids hypnotism may, when truly applied, yield to man: "This will seem to most minds a paltry counterpoise to the depressing views of man's dignity and destiny which the train of argument in this paper implies."

Mr. Myers, however, admits that "the soul very probably exists," and he believes that further experiments with hypnotism may lead to far higher revelations than they have yet brought to him; and here one cannot but regret that he should not have matured these experiments before delivering himself; for in a noble peroration, with which he concludes his paper, surrendering himself to the inspiration of the poetic fire, he has a vision of higher things coming from afar.

When that day comes to him, he will see that his present theories are but the "baseless fabric of a vision."

This we know, that there are those who, with a pure heart and a devout mind, have witnessed the deeply-entranced soul risen beyond the disorderly purgatory of an insane "electro-biology," and standing apart, and if that soul responded at all to questioning, has done so in the words of instruction, of warning, or of command. Thus it is that while the lower forms of trance exhibit the soul in a state of reverie, the higher entrancement exhibits the soul as the true Ego—the persistent and the dominant personality.

But beyond this, still, there is the holy entrancement of the tortured saint, who, while the flesh is burned with fire and torn with iron screws, blasphemously in the name of Christ by fiends in the shape of men, leaving the body for a time, has risen into the sphere of the immortals, has conversed with the spirits of just men made perfect, beheld that which eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive,—while falling before the Great White Throne of Him Who liveth for ever and ever.

If a canoe be connected by a cord to a distant ship, one in the canoe may, if he cannot draw the ship to him, draw himself to the ship. So it is with prayer: if it do not bring God to man it will bring man to God, and this is always well for man.—W. P. BREED.

The Spiritual Offering says:—"The past history of Methodism, and the persecutions and misrepresentation it encountered, should inspire the Methodists of to-day with kindlier feelings toward Spiritualism than have hitherto been manifest. The Church needs, and will by-and-bye have to appeal to Spiritualism to save it from the inroads of materialism. Faith in a future life is not enough; the world is calling for facts which Spiritualism alone can give."

A SINGULAR SECT.—"The Nest of Godly People" is the title of a Russian sect which has come into existence during the last fifteen years. Its headquarters (according to a Times correspondent) appear to be at Bender, Bessarabia, and its name is due to the fact that its members—all of the peasant class—dig a grave in the floor of their habitations, or in their gardens, and lie therein, as they say, to commune with God, confess to Him their sins, and examine their past life. The grave is covered with a wooden box-like lid with a door in it for ingress and egress, and they lie in the grave as in a coffin. When the grave or "nest" is in the garden, it is surrounded with bushes for the sake of greater privacy, and guarded by a watch-dog to prevent curious people going near it. These sectarists pretend that in their ecstatic moments and when suffering extreme hunger, they see saints and devils. Some are subject to hallucinations. They hold as little conversation as possible with other people, with each other, indeed, so that the life they lead is akin to that of uncloistered monks.

A PHENOMENAL EXPERIENCE.—A correspondent of the Truthseeker (T. J. C.) writing from Lemoore, Cal., relates the following:—"I was sent early to the public school in Leicester, Mass., and was there till ten years old. Among my playmates was a little girl about my age. At twelve I went to sea. In May, 1855, I sailed from New York in the brig Samuel and Edward (Captain Raymonds) for South America, loaded with lumber. The weather was stormy. On the 10th of June, 8 p.m., I went to the fore-castle, through a small hatchway, to lie down in my hammock. Scarcely a moment elapsed before I was conscious of something in the hatchway. I watched. First appeared a faint glimmer of bluish light, notwithstanding there was a slush lamp burning, affording sufficient light for all purposes. In this bluish light, at the foot of the hatchway ladder, appeared, faint at first, but soon quite distinct, my little school-mate, of Leicester, beckoning to me to get up. To convince myself that I was not dreaming, I went on deck, talked with the man on the lookout, got wet, and went below again. The apparition was visible from my hammock, gesticulating as before, and remained till midnight, causing me annoyance. June 11th, from 12 p.m. till 4 a.m., was a repetition of the 10th; but on June 12th, from 8 p.m. till midnight, my strange visitor was more distinct. Her hair, before tied up, was down, being tossed back with the left hand, while beckoning me with the right. While gazing I heard the man at the helm begin striking eight bells (twelve o'clock, midnight), when my vision vanished as if with a shriek. I sprang up to go aft to relieve the helm, and reached the quarter-deck not an instant too soon to escape the fate of my shipmates forward, by the brig colliding with an English ship during the darkest night of my recollection. And now the sequel: In the spring of 1868, I visited my old home. Meeting my former schoolmate, now married, with her parents, at a social gathering, I was invited to spend a few days with them. At the supper table, one evening, Mrs. — asked me if Mr. — had told me of her three dreams about me on the 10th, 11th, and 12th of June, 1855 (being much talked of in the home circle, the dates were preserved). In relating her dream, she described the fore-castle, the swinging bed (hammock), the ladder to go up, the tin lamp, and the gloomy appearance of the place, and said she woke up the last night with a scream."—The Golden Gate.

SPIRITUALISM AT HOME AND CONTINUED ELSEWHERE.

On the 7th November, in "LIGHT," p. 539, I broke a long silence by referring to some human characteristics pertaining to spiritual phenomena, prompted by a previous reference thereto in this journal. Not that the home phenomena, to which I have frequently called the attention of your readers, have ceased—far from it—but because for many months past we have been developing and carefully recording notes of other phenomena occurring in our family séances.

While still, as yet, incomplete, we admitted an uncle of mine who has sat with us on other occasions, and whose name is well known. Phenomena then occurred which led us, on his account, to seek, outside our own circle, a completion of what with us is only partially developed. Very briefly I will record what led him to ask for more. In dim light, with the medium in the cabinet—which was dark—materialised hands were formed in a very convincing manner. A small globe of light first came out of the cabinet, stationing itself between the opened curtains. This gradually grew into the shape of a small child-like hand; the child's hand grew, under our close observation, to a beautifully-formed female hand, which our visitor thought resembled one he well knew. And now, by spirit direction, the lights were put out, and we sat in darkness. The hands now appeared about the room. One took my daughter's hand, lifted it high up above her head and kissed it, thus showing that a form was also there. My uncle then had his head and face fondly caressed by a hand, probably that which he had previously recognised. A considerable breeze was diffused all over the room, and most of us were touched during this abnormal occurrence. I am quite aware that all this could be explained glibly, but I am now writing for Spiritualists who will understand the impression such phenomena would make on an unbiassed mind, and I only record it for one purpose. It led to Dr. Morell wishing, before he returned to Italy for the winter, to see this phenomenon in its full development; and a medium, well known to us,—whose name shall be X. to the public—kindly gave us a sitting for the purpose. The notes of that sitting, as now recorded, have been read and approved by five of those present, three of whom have the temerity to sign the report for publication.

In an upper room, carpeted all over, and opening into a smaller room, eight of us sat down at 8.20 p.m., having first carefully inspected both rooms, locked both the outer doors, and placed securely a gummed paper over the opening crack of the door in the inner room, which led on to the landing where gas was burning. The paper so gummed was initialed by Dr. Morell, and was found intact at the end of our sitting at 10.20. We sat in dim light, sufficient, however, to see one another plainly, and those who had good sight could tell the time on their watches.

I should say that during the evening four or five distinctly different female spirits came and walked among us, and also two male spirits: probably there were eight or ten appearances, but some were duplicates, i.e., the same spirit after retiring into the dark room returned again.

One of the female spirits came to a lady who sat next to me, and placing her hands on her shoulders drew her towards her and kissed her. In doing this I distinctly saw a beautifully-formed hand and arm, quite bare up to, and above the elbow, and it was not so large as any man's arm. Another form saluted a gentleman present, and spoke to him. A third female spirit, which appeared to have less power, approached Dr. Morell. She evidently tried to put her arms about him, but not succeeding, she stretched out both her hands towards him and repeatedly kissed one hand (similar to the one he had seen at our home circle) and threw kisses to him. This was a clearly-formed female figure, and the arms, bare to the elbow, were distinctly seen by us all.

One of the male forms, who appeared to have gathered up much force, was recognised at once by my wife as her father. He came up to us (sitting together), shook hands with us both, then kissed my wife on the forehead, covering her face with his beard in so doing. He then turned his face towards the light and to Dr. Morell, who observed a resemblance to E. M., and shook hands with him. We all three remarked on the physical power in the hand; bones and muscles all felt as natural as in life; there was no timidity in his grasp; he retired three times into the dark room, and coming out again walked firmly about the room, being clearly seen by all the circle.

Mrs. R. remarked on his physique and features: there was no mistaking him by those who knew him in earth-life; the three who sign this report had that privilege.

The last materialisation was remarkable, inasmuch as we saw the spirit-form developed in our midst. The medium X. was made to come out in deep trance, and in evident distress; he walked about the room rapidly, during which time frequent bright lights were seen flashing from his left side. He said: "talk—talk or do something." We, at once, sang all together "Shall we gather at the river," which seemed to give the necessary focussing power for what followed. Where lights had been seen flashing, now appeared white drapery, at first looking like a very fine white handkerchief hanging from a pocket, but higher up than X.'s pockets actually were. X. now pulled away at this gauze-like drapery, and nervously or excitedly drew out and laid upon the floor some five yards of this light fleecy material. First coming out of his side as a broad ribbon, it spread speedily over the floor just under our eyes. Watching intently this heap of fine white drapery, we saw a figure forming under it; a head first, then shoulders, until a full form six feet high was developed, some two or three feet distant from the medium, who now seemed attached to the form by the drapery only. X. now pulled away at the latter, and disclosed a fine head of curly black hair and dark penetrating eyes. X. was apparently thoroughly exhausted, and his strength seemed to have invested itself in the spirit-form, who now sheltered the medium, put his arm about him, I think, but, anyhow, supported him, and gradually led him back into the dark room and placed him on a chair.

Soon after I was called into the dark room, where I found X. distressed, and receiving a few directions from the spirit, in direct voice, I retired. X. soon returned to consciousness, and wanted water, which I gave him, and last of all a female form, of about four feet high, materialised, and in glistening white, stood for a few seconds at the opening of the curtains, and then faded away into darkness.

IN THE
OBJECTIVE PHENOMENA OF SPIRITUALISM

There is no conjecture about the cases I am about to narrate and refer to. I introduce them here because they illustrate the process of formation, though in some cited instances the medium was not actually secluded from view. The slight deviation from logical classification may, I hope, be excused by a plea of increased convenience and force in the presentation of evidence.

In the year 1877 the process of materialization was first observed (so far as I know) without the intervention of any cabinet or curtain, and under conditions when the exact steps of building up a human body could be accurately watched. Up to that time much conjecture had been expended without much knowledge being gained. The most probable view was that the medium was depleted of a certain amount of vital force, which was employed in forming what was at first a shadowy and impalpable body, but which, under favourable conditions, and in the presence of certain mediums, grew to a condition not distinguishable in appearance, nor by weight, from the body of a full-grown human being. How this energy so withdrawn from the body of the medium was used we were unable to say. Nor are we much more advanced now: albeit the startling phenomena then witnessed by myself and others in the presence of Francis W. Monck have been repeated and carefully observed in the presence of other mediums, especially W. Eglinton. What occurred in the cases observed by myself and others was briefly this: Monck stood in front of a pair of folding doors which separated the room in which the observers sat from an empty bedroom; this room had been carefully searched, and its outer door secured. There was, in my opinion, no possibility of access to it, nor would what I watched have been affected by the presence in it of any number of possible accomplices. I by no means lose sight of the allegation that some phenomena which occurred about this time in the presence of this medium were open to suspicion. I express no opinion as to the truth of this statement, for, even if it were proven, it would not affect what I saw, and it is with what my eyes witnessed that I am here concerned. Moreover, allegations such as these are freely brought against mediums by those who find the marvels that they hear of too difficult for digestion. The charge is easily brought, and sometimes is sustained, apparently by superficial evidence. But I know no medium who, after having been, as is alleged, caught in imposture, has not given proof that in his or her presence genuine psychical phenomena do unquestionably occur.

I recur, then, to the facts which I witnessed under circumstances which, I hold, precluded fraud, and I reproduce the narrative which I wrote while the facts were fresh in my mind. I see no reason to withdraw any part of it as being inaccurate in its terms, or inconsistent with the observations of others who had better facilities than were accorded to me.

"The materialization of a spirit watched. Notes of a séance held with Dr. Monck as medium, at his rooms, 26, Southampton-row, on October 19th, 1877, at 8.30 p.m. Present—Rev. Thos. Colley, Mrs. Colley, and myself. By 'M.A. (Oxon.)'

"The second-floor room in which the séance was held opens into an inner room, and each room has a door opening on to the landing. The sitting-room door was locked, and that of the inner room I secured by means of gummed paper (the outside of a sheet of 2½d. stamps, bearing the peculiar marks and letters that belong to stamps of that price), initialled by myself. Mr. Colley and I searched the inner room throughout. There was no other means of access to it except by a window which looked down into a back yard. There was nothing in the room which could have been used in producing the phenomena I am about to record. Between the two rooms a door was left open, and a counterpane was suspended over the doorway. The room in which we sat was faintly lighted by a very small paraffin lamp, which was placed in a corner of the room and shaded. Though the eye became accustomed to the dim light by degrees, and could make out the forms and features presented, the light throughout the evening was less than I desire for exact observation. We were informed that the medium was exhausted by previous sances, and that the light was much less than usual.

"After a short sitting at the table, Dr. Monck retired into the inner room, and presently appeared standing at the doorway between the two rooms, drew aside the curtains, and, entranced by Samuel, stood and conversed with us. We were all sitting at the table, about two yards and a-half from the medium. By degrees a faint cloud of white, at first like a fine white mist, appeared by his left side, and in the course of a minute or two, during which the medium gasped and shuddered convulsively, a small but perfectly-formed figure of a child, a little under or about four feet in height, grew by his side. This figure seemed to be united to the medium by a line of white mist, but the light was not good enough to enable me to say positively that it was so.

"The child was, undoubtedly, a separate entity, distinct from the medium. Samuel maintained a perpetual current of conversation, came round to me and grasped both my hands, and placed the medium's lips on the back of one of them. During this time we could all see and hear the little figure clapping her hands, and could hear words proceeding from her mouth. She also rang a little hand-bell with sufficient vigour to break it.

"When she had remained for some appreciable time at a distance of not less than six feet from the medium, he drew near to her to give her more vitality; and when this was expended the process was again renewed, until at length he stood again by her side, and she vanished from my eyes; but the light again was not strong enough to enable me to say positively that the absorption into the body of the medium, described by Mr. Colley, took place. Both stood by the curtain, and by degrees the form vanished, leaving a round misty appearance on the left side of the medium's black coat. This, too, faded, and he came to us alone. Had the curtain between the two rooms been black, I might have seen what took place more clearly.

"After a very brief interval of retirement in the inner room, the medium again stepped forward, and, pulling the curtain aside, stood in the doorway. By his side came a similar misty appearance which developed rapidly, until there stood before us a man of considerably taller stature than the medium, swarthy and oriental in type, with large black beard and moustache, and with dusky arms and hands. On his head was an ornament which flashed in the dim light. He was draped from head to foot in white, and making allowance for the deceptive nature of such an appearance in uncertain light, I should say that Mr. Colley's estimate that the form exceeded the medium's height by eight inches, is under rather than over the mark. I speak with confidence, because I asked the figure to stand in a position which enabled me to measure its height against the side of the doorway with my eye. I have no doubt that the figure was firmly planted on its feet, because the same height was maintained in all its movements.

"In this case, again, there was no room for doubt that the figure was separate from the medium, and was endowed with vitality and volition. At request, the Mahedi (such is his title) took up a chair and put it on the table, removed it and sat down upon it, with the clumsy, jerky movement that I have before noticed in these forms, wrote some hieroglyphics in my pocket-book, and moved round to a remote corner of the room while the medium was by my chair. In this position Dr. Monck, under control, grasped both my hands, and placed his lips on the back of one of them, and under those conditions the form spoke, and moved round to the table. At request, the medium held one of my hands, while the form touched the other. The medium's hands were very warm, those of the figure cold, almost clammy, and very lean and dusky in appearance.

"The same process was gone through while the child-figure was before us, and I noticed then that the little hand given to me was life-like and natural to the touch. Not so with the Mahedi's hand. Its deathly coldness sent a shudder through me.

"After several journeys of the medium to vitalise the form, as in the previous case, the same scene was enacted near the curtain. The medium and form stood side by side, and the latter gradually vanished; but whether it was dissipated, or retired into the inner room, or was absorbed into the medium, there was not light enough to enable me to see.

"After the disappearance of the form, the medium, still entranced, requested us to examine the inner room. Mr. Colley and I at once did so. My seal on the door was intact, and no suspicious object of any kind was discovered by a thorough scrutiny.

"My testimony should be read in connection with that already published by Mr. Colley. He had better light and better means of close observation than it was possible to afford me. . . . For the present I can only say that what I saw was consistent with his statement of what he saw under better conditions of observation."

In a subsequent number of the Spiritualist (November 30th, 1877), I supplemented my narrative by noticing some further points.

1. "As to the mode of production and dissipation of the form. The evidence goes to show that it is reproduced from the left side of the medium, near the region of the heart. The first appearance is nebulous, as though vapour were in a state of agitation, and was being condensed into a solid form. The motion is as if a vortex were created within the figure. It is apparently united to the medium by a cord of the same nebulous substance as that of which itself is formed. By-and-bye this is severed by a motion of the medium's hand, and the figure is apparently, but not really, alone and independent. Not actually independent, I say, for it is necessary for the medium to approach the form at intervals of a few minutes in order to revive its vitality. . . . The mode of absorption seems to be analogous to that of its evolution. The same notion of a vortex is preserved. It is, so to say, sucked unto the medium and re-absorbed. . . .

2. "Now what was this vapour which was so agitated from a central point as to form this figure? What was the pabulum? Briefly, odic, psychic, or vital force. It is the universal pabulum, the raw material used in all operations of this nature. At a séance I see it as floating masses of luminous vapour which condense into forms visible to my clairvoyant sense, or form the material out of which the invisible operators produce whatever physical manifestations they desire. I have seen it as a fiery cloud over the circle before some scent-laden breeze has swept over us; as a pillar of light, when the same scented air is carried round the circle; as a ball of light when peculiar rappings are made; in short it is the pabulum of spirit manifestations. And here we get a clue to its source. It is the medium's vital force.

3. "The variety of materials, if I may use the term, made out of this pabulum is not a little singular. Drapery, metal, and, so far as one could tell, 'all things that appertain to the perfection of man's nature.' The drapery that appears in connection with these forms has always been a puzzle. Whence does it come? And when the séance is over, whither has it gone? . . .

"The hand, too, was to all intents and purposes fashioned as mine is, but cold, and giving off or surrounded with a most repellent atmosphere. It felt like the hand of a corpse, and approaching, it sent a shudder through me. It seemed to me as if the air were in circulation round it; as if, indeed, the whole body, with its circumambient atmosphere, were held in attraction round a centre. The notion of a vortex never left me.

"I had another opportunity on the evening of November 24th last (1877) of witnessing the production of this drapery. Mr. Eglinton was the medium, and the séance was held at the house of Mrs. Makkdougall Gregory, 21, Green-street. The medium lay on a sofa in our sight; and here again testimony is rendered of far less value on account of the very dim light permitted. What apparently took place was very similar to what I saw with Dr. Monck. A nebulous mass appeared: it seemed to be in a state of constant motion; the medium, too, rolled on the sofa backwards and forwards until his whole body was enveloped in a mass of white gauzy drapery. He afterwards stood up, draped from head to foot in this white substance. Where it came from I do not know, or how it was made, or what became of it. One must see the same thing again and again, and in very much better light before offering any opinion.

4. "The movements of the forms were constrained and automaton-like. There was an absence of lithe freedom of movement which was very striking. The little girl would clap her hands and ring a hand-bell, and her lips moved as whispering sounds issued from them. The male figure lifted a chair, sat down with difficulty and awkwardness, and at my request inscribed some characters in my note-book. But the movements were unnatural and constrained, as I have before noticed in some of these forms.

5. "Lastly, what was the formative power?

"I believe it to be one external to the figure. I believe them to be pieces of animated spirit-sculpture controlled ab extra, possibly in a manner analogous to that in which a mesmeriser controls the movements of his subject. Everything pointed to this conclusion—the constrained attitudes, the movements so automaton-like, the hollow sepulchral voice; the reiterated refreshing of the forms from the body of the medium, and the notion of a number of molecules temporarily held in attraction round a centre of force which was prominent to my mind throughout:—all this favours the idea of external creation and control. Who the operator was I do not know, but I believe him to be distinct from that specimen of his handiwork which I saw. . . .

Work for the London Spiritualist Alliance.

SIR,—Permit me to call more direct attention to a munificent offer, particulars of which appear as a footnote to my recent address ("LIGHT," p. 573.). Mr. James Regan (Lydian House, Westbury-gardens, Clapham Park, S.W.) offers the sum of £100 towards the opening of an institution in London for the gratuitous healing of disease by laying on of hands. He also promises to devote his own gift of healing to this work. We have in the Metropolis many who have the power of healing the sick and of alleviating suffering. I hope that we may find it possible to establish some Metropolitan institution in connection with the London Spiritualist Alliance, and to attach to it these various psychopaths—if I may use a convenient term to avoid circumlocution—in such manner as physicians and surgeons are attached to our great hospitals. In the early days the mesmeric infirmary was an institution of a kindred nature to that which I desiderate. And, though the methods there employed were wholly confined to mesmeric treatment, the results obtained were extremely satisfactory. It is one of the curious pieces of evidence that unwelcome truth cannot root itself by any forcing process in unwilling and unready minds, that this institution should have passed away into oblivion without leaving a trace beyond some almost unknown records of its beneficent work. The world was not prepared for it: but we have grown in knowledge during the past quarter of a century, and I believe that Spiritualists are ready now to welcome some efforts at real work, such as I partially sketched in my recent address to the Alliance.

I believe that many Spiritualists have got beyond the stage of mere wonder-hunting; even beyond that of defiant criticism when every separate phenomenon is scrutinised with suspicion as if it stood alone by itself, and was not one of a vast group that have systematically been presented to critical investigation for many years. I believe that to many minds the "Higher Aspects of Spiritualism" are as truly present as what "Vivat Veritas," in an otherwise admirable letter with which (except in some criticism of "LIGHT") I largely agree, calls the "pseudo-scientific examination of the facts of Spiritualism." It is very important that our scientific acquaintance with the methods at work in the production of phenomena with the occurrence of which we are intimately familiar should be extended by practical research. We shall gain nothing by the mere repetition of these familiar facts; but we have all to learn as to the methods employed in their production. This is the sphere of truly scientific research which the London Spiritualist Alliance proposes to occupy. And I trust that the projected circles when formed will definitely devote themselves to practical research by which our store of knowledge may be increased, and not merely to the unproductive and aimless repetition of phenomena with which we are all superficially acquainted.

If it were possible, by the possession of pecuniary means, to carry out in full a plan of work that would be a satisfactory expression of our faith in practice, this would be in some measure the ideal. A minimising of non-essential divergence of opinion so that union in essentials might be secured amongst Spiritualists the world over. A hearty co-operation amongst Spiritualists in each country, so that division in the ranks should be impossible, and each country should bring to the Confederation an united body. Actual definite scientific research such as I have already propounded. The organisation of some charitable work such as that of the healing of disease which Mr. Regan advocates, so that our faith may find expression in acts of mercy and beneficence. The establishment of some devotional service which shall express in concrete form that faith which, as Spiritualists, we hold in common, and shall give opportunity for us to dwell on those higher aspects of Spiritualism to which I have alluded, and to nurture the faith which is in us by the means which all religious minds find serviceable, and which few can afford wholly to neglect. To this might, perhaps, be added some attempt at direct educational work, such as is successfully carried out in the lyceums of Australia and America.

The time, unless I read its signs wrongly, is near at hand when such a plan as this will be carried into effect. It is very desirable that it should be done in an orderly manner, and as the expression of our common faith as Spiritualists. For this reason it is to my mind important that it should be done, with all respect for work already being done by others, and with jealous care in no way to interfere with it, by the London Spiritualist Alliance. I wish the work could be truly national, embracing all organisations throughout Great Britain. The time is not ripe for that, but it is ripe for the commencement by us of a work too long delayed.

Antiquated Laws.

SIR,—Some weeks ago there was an editorial article in "LIGHT." I think under the above heading; and now I see that Mr. Barkas has been interrogating Mr. Cowen, the Parliamentary candidate at Newcastle, on the subject of a law supposed to bear unjustly on Spiritualism. The question was: "Will Mr. Cowen vote for the abolition of the antiquated law which prohibits persons with occult powers from professionally using those powers? For example, Mr. Gladstone saw phenomena in the presence of Mr. Eglinton, and the law as it at present stands renders the exhibition of those occult powers for payment penal."

Now at the time of the Slade prosecution I was at considerable trouble to explain the state of the common and statute law on this subject in the Spiritualist, and also to my friend, "M.A. (Oxon.)," for the purpose of a pamphlet he was then writing ("Slade Case"), and to which any one may still be referred for an accurate statement. With the exception of the old and quite obsolete Act of 9 George II. c. 5, which prohibits the pretence "to exercise or use any kind of witchcraft, sorcery, enchantment, or conjuration," I know of no law which could possibly be held to answer Mr. Barkas' description, or to which his illustration would apply. Were mediumship held to be included under the terms above cited—and I am far from saying that our courts would not so decide—Mr. Barkas would even have understated the case, because the Act says nothing about payment, but makes the pretence itself penal. Nor would it be in the least necessary under that Act to prove the pretence unfounded, or that there was any deceit in fact in the particular case. But although there was just a reference to, or menace of, this obsolete old Act, by the solicitor for the prosecution in the Slade case at Bow-street, its employment has never yet been seriously contemplated. Slade was convicted under the fourth section of the Vagrant Act of George IV., and to talk of repealing that section is preposterous. It is a sort of "omnibus" section, including all sorts of offences which none would wish should go unpunished. The part relating to "palmistry or otherwise" requires that the "subtle craft or device" shall be "to deceive or impose upon," &c., and actual fraud must be proved. The fact that the tribunal is very likely to hold it proved on evidence which would not satisfy us is no logical objection to the law, and would certainly not for a moment be entertained by Parliament as a reason for altering the law. I humbly conceive that the Vagrant Act was wrongly held applicable by the judges in the Monck case—in the Slade case that point of law did not come before them, though I was prepared to have argued it had not my success upon a more technical preliminary point* made that unnecessary. Still, until the decision of Barons Cleasby and Pollock in the Monck case is reversed, fraudulent mediumship is within that section. The Lawrence case was simply a charge under the general law relating to false pretences. We could probably succeed in getting the old Act of George II. repealed or amended; but that would be of little use, for we are in no serious danger from it. As to the fourth section of the Vagrant Act, I think it is useful in protecting ignorant servant girls and persons of that class from imposition. The abuse was in applying a law simply intended for that purpose as an instrument of prejudice, and to impede investigation by genuine inquirers. But as proof of fraud is required, we could only ask that mediumship should be exempted on the ground that the general law relating to false pretences and conspiracy is adequate to deal with any real case of imposition. I am afraid it is also adequate, as it would at present be administered, to deal with honest mediumship, and that we must look rather to a more general acquaintance with the facts on the part of the public than to any amendment of the law for the protection of mediums.

"Hearing Voices."

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—In a letter of mine which you were so good as to publish in your number of September 12th, headed "Facts or Fancies," I alluded to an article in the Daily Telegraph of August 10th, in which that journal said, "Half the unfortunate creatures in our madhouses fancy they hear voices." This was, I hope, one of the last dying efforts of this journal, in its very continuous attempts, for many years, to throw a slur upon things spiritual. If not, let me refer it to our courts of justice, to learn from them some lessons in reason and common-sense in accord with the evidence of all ages.

In the Law Intelligence of the Queen's Bench Division, November 20th, 1885, before the Lord Chief Justice Coleridge, in the case of Weldon v. De Bathe, we find the judge addressing a witness, Dr. Rutherford, thus:—

JUDGE: Do you really think that a person who speaks of seeing visions, and a light shining about her, is fit for Dr. Winslow's Asylum?

DR. RUTHERFORD: Not because of these things.

JUDGE: What made you think Mrs. Weldon should go there?

DR. RUTHERFORD: It was an unpleasant symptom—Mrs. Weldon hearing voices.

JUDGE: Does that make a person dangerous?

DR. RUTHERFORD: Yes; when she acts upon the voice—does what it tells her.

JUDGE: Would you have shut up Socrates?

DR. RUTHERFORD: I don't think he was treated very well.

Here we see there is not a single word to imply that either the judge or the doctor thought "hearing voices" was mere fancy, quite the contrary; the question is maintained seriously throughout; and it came well from one of the family of the great initiator of Broad Church views, and author of "Aids to Reflection," Samuel Taylor Coleridge.

Let me now turn to the Court of Appeal, of July 19th, 1884, in the case of Weldon v. Winslow, before the Master of the Rolls and Lords Justices Bowen and Fry. Mr. Edward Clarke, Q.C., in the course of his address on the part of the defendant, said: "The plaintiff's own doctors, in cross-examination, had admitted that saying she heard a voice, and was bound to obey it, was one of the most serious and dangerous forms of insanity."

LORD JUSTICE BOWEN: I recollect that the Bishop of Winchester stated that when that diocese was offered to him he heard a voice, which told him to take it."

I doubt myself very much whether the plaintiff, in this case, ever said she was bound to obey every voice she heard. Well, we are not all Socrateses, or Bishops either; but from what is generally known of the prelate in question we are sure that he was prompted by none but the highest motives, or he would have strangely belied his respected character.

As regards voices and manifestations in general, and I speak from some knowledge of the former, I must say that I think, as I have said before, that your weekly caution is admirable, and, perhaps, more reliable than voices, in a general way, concerning which I could say much; so I cannot do better than repeat your advice: "Do not believe everything you are told, for, though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning spirit, it also has its accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your reason."

The Bishop above alluded to was the only Bishop who attended the "Old Church Conference" under Dr. Döllinger, of Bavaria. He also decided a hot controversy, by permitting prayers for the dead to be inscribed on tombstones in the Protestant cemeteries of his diocese.

The Phenomenality of the Subject.

SIR,—I am very grateful to "C.C.M." for his patient consideration of my difficulties. He will, I hope, excuse a somewhat brief rejoinder, as such controversy has probably little interest for most of your readers.

(1) "C.C.M." says that in my analysis of percipience I "dismiss the subject, and replace it by the subjective aspect in the phenomenon." I quite agree with what he says as to the distinction between the two. I only "dismissed" the subject in the sense of not introducing something that I thought irrelevant. The question between us seemed better (because more simply) stateable in respect of a single object and single act of percipience, than in respect of a whole world of objects, and a whole life of percipience. The fact that I can conceive having the presentation "lamp," without being myself perceptible, is not in the least affected by the fact that the lamp forms an item in a coherent wider world of objects, or (which is the same) that the I who perceive it would not be that I, or perhaps an I at all, but for belonging to a connected stream of experience of such a world. All of the I that has any bearing on my argument is contained in the series of presentations, each one of which I can conceive experiencing without being myself perceptible. I fully admit in me something more than the mere series—something that makes the series one; but I did not dwell on this, as I did not and do not see how my subjective unity and continuance should make me any more perceptible—any more of a phenomenon to others.

(2) I have no difference with "C.C.M." as to the organisation of experience; but of course the I so organised is, as he says, phenomenon only to myself. In this sense, then, it is something different from what I was asserting to be a logical condition of percipience, which was an organism perceptible to me and others alike. I am no way concerned to deny a "subject-object." I agree that, in reflection, I can make myself a sort of object. I can think over the various "subjective aspects" which have fallen to my lot, and think of each of them as mine, and of the united whole of them as me, as distinct from the not me which gave them their objective aspects. Nor would I quarrel with "C.C.M." for calling this sort of object a phenomenon, provided it be recognised that it stands completely apart from the lamp and all other phenomena—being the result of a process of abstraction, an object only for reflection, never for direct perception. But such a phenomenon is clearly not even the subjective aspect of "C.C.M.'s" phenomenal I, not even the feelings of the organism, and much less the organism itself, which makes me sensible to myself and others, and which (as I contended) is not logically implied by the fact that I am sensitive, or that I can organise my sensations.

(3) Lastly, as regards the personal point in space, "C.C.M." does not attempt to show—what according to his former language, needed to be shown—that such a local point, which is implied by my perceptions of an external world, could be, or do duty for, the organism which is not so implied—the sensible object which puzzles or should puzzle the Idealist by presenting nerve-changes that are at once correlated with and irrelevant to his ideas. I must therefore ask how an ideal centre of spatial relations, even if identified with the self which becomes in reflection an object to me, could possibly be an object, a perceptible organism, to others. I must ask how a perfectly simple point could possibly present the other aspect of what (according to the paper that I was criticising) was also my organism, namely, my mode of receptivity to (or my construction of) my orderly various world of coloured objects which hold to that point only one relation, the nakedly spatial. And even after everything has been abstracted that could make an "organism" in either of the senses in which "C.C.M." previously used the word, the local point that remains is still described by him in a way with which I cannot quite agree. The objectivity which he attributes to it, in the endeavour to make it an "object among objects," is of a sort which I think it could hardly win for itself. If I had no visible and extended organism, if I had not found this in the world of external objects, though my experience of my world might be as keen and various as now, I do not think that the words "space" and "externality" could retain at all their present connotation. The presentations of the "external" world would probably pass before my supposed point more after the fashion of the passages of a symphony; and though the relation of their parts to the point would still be quite definite, and the "externality" would represent a specific form of experience, I doubt whether it would involve anything like the sense of vis-à-vis-ness or parallelism suggested to me now by the phrase "positing myself in space." I wish "C.C.M." would tell me in what world I "place my self-consciousness," and how I "clothe it homogeneously," when I am listening to music—which, for all that concerns the point in debate between us, is a presentation (or series of presentations) exactly on a par with the lamp.

May I add a word on quite another subject? Mr. Roden Noel's able papers, now in process of publication, claim most attentive consideration, and I will not attempt, for the moment, to consider them in detail. But there is one topic as to which I should be glad to point out at once, that not nearly so great a difference of view exists as Mr. Noel seems to imagine. Readers of his last paper will see how much in accordance with it are the following remarks, provisionally written by me some months ago, as part of a discussion of deferred telepathic impressions, in "Phantasms of the Living."

As our telepathic theory is a psychical one, and makes no physical assumptions, it would be perfectly applicable to the conditions of spiritual existence. And it may be quite fairly asked why this possibility was not taken account of above, in connection with the phantasms that have shortly followed deaths. What need is there, it may be said, to trace these phenomena to a state of the agent preceding or exactly synchronising with his physical decease, when his psychical life may be supposed to be continuing after the great change? The answer is that the point is not one of theoretic possibilities, but of evidence; and that the evidence for post mortem communications seems to us inconclusive. As evidence to an intelligent existing cause outside the percipient, the alleged manifestations of deceased persons which have not shortly followed after death are wholly incomparable with those that have so followed; for with the latter (as with all the evidential cases cited in this book) the very keystone of the argument is the coincidence, more or less close, but always close enough to be remarked. That—and often that alone—is the obstacle to regarding the cases as purely subjective; failing that, very special and peculiar features must be present, to establish even a presumption of some exciting cause external to the percipient's own mind. For example, the same hallucination might affect several persons independently and at different times; or the phantasm might convey information, afterwards discovered to be true, of something which the percipient had never known—this last condition being probably the only one which could prove an intelligent external cause. A certain amount of evidence of both these types exists, of a quality which makes it imperative on us to keep our minds open for more; but at present, as I have said, we have arrived at no definite conclusion. For a sketch and criticism of the present state of the question, see Mrs. Sidgwick's paper "On the Evidence, collected by the S.P.R., for Phantasms of the Dead," in Vol. III. of the Proceedings.

I am, Sir,

Yours obediently,

EDMUND GURNEY.

Our Spiritist neighbours on the Continent are active in their propaganda. The Athénée Spirite of Marseilles, Le Messager says, caused thousands of copies of the Echo de la Tombe to be distributed in the cemeteries on the occasion of the fête des morts. At Ghent a similar distribution was made of a publication of the same name, both containing appropriate articles. Le Spiritisme says that it distributed its stock of back numbers at the Paris cemeteries. The Société Scientifique du Spiritisme also distributed a special sheet on the same occasion. At Lyons 20,000 copies of testimonies of prominent men in favour of Spiritist facts were distributed. This example was followed at Grenoble by our friend M. Carrier. This system of propaganda would be well applied to other places, such for instance as Tourcoing where clerical influence is so strong that some of the large manufacturers require their employés to keep church-fast on Fridays, and recite church-prayers mornings and evenings. At Areq, clericalism is still more pronounced, for a house proprietor there demands higher rents from those who do not attend Mass. At Taminies, (Belgium), the burgomaster went beyond his powers by ordering the remains of a woman known to have been a Spiritist, to be buried in the "Coin des réprouvés," the corner for those dying under the ban of the church. But for this he was summoned before the Correctional Tribunal.

TRICK-SEEKERS AND TRUTH-FINDERS.

It is incumbent on those who possess knowledge to realise the strength its possession bestows, and to act as men strong in the conviction born of personal experience. Not to the ignorant, the weak of heart, the feeble of purpose, or the dishonest of method is given the power that leaves its mark upon the world. The pioneers of civilisation, all who have contributed most largely to the advancement of human knowledge and the amelioration of their fellows, and the rulers of the hearts of men, have been cast in a different mould. They have been men of faith—of faith in God and man, and in the future of mankind; men of knowledge, singleness of purpose, and purity of aim—seekers for truth in the spirit of truth; men who, having discerned the almost universally deadly and soul-chilling influence of the over-wise philosophy of the schools, have realised that there is something in life worth living for, that by reason of the innate germ of goodness and righteousness in man the world, so far from being irretrievably bad, is, step by step, drawing nearer and nearer to Him in Whom we live and move and have our being.

The principles embodied in the lives of such men have a special application to those who concern themselves with the things of the spirit. He who would pass the threshold of the inquiry must be honest of heart and pure in method. We cannot too earnestly insist upon the absolute necessity for such a spirit of inquiry in order to ensure the best results; indeed, there is no more effective barrier to successful investigation than its absence. The status of Spiritualism to-day (and few, except, perhaps, the ignorant and the prejudiced will be inclined to deny the power it exercises as a factor in modern life and thought) is due, not to the endorsement of the churches, the seal of science, or to the labours of this or that society, but simply and solely to the stoutness of heart, the steadfastness of purpose, and the purity of method which has characterised those whose names we, as Spiritualists, now honour as household words amongst us. Having sought for truth in the spirit of truth, and, having found it, coming boldly forth in its defence, these pioneers of the new epoch stand out as exemplars for those who seek to follow in their steps. Unswerving in their loyalty to the truth, they, in their day, stood boldly forth regardless of ridicule and scorn, against all comers, in its defence, inculcating the clean methods by which they had themselves sought and gained personal conviction. It now rests with us, as a body, to conserve, guard, and extend the heritage committed to our care.

Chiefest amongst the duties involved by this legacy is to care for and protect those who are the channels of communication between the seen and the unseen; to guard them against the ignorant, the prejudiced, and the wonder-hunter; and last, but not least, to secure them against contact with those whose cavilling, hair-splitting scepticism, and want of appreciation of the fundamental laws affecting spiritual research, would endanger their value as instruments for spirit-communion.

This is a real danger, and it must be met and turned aside. There are those who, affecting psychical research, have so muddled themselves with unbelief and incredulity as to have fallen into the arms of an incredible credulity. Immersed in the fog of immature speculation they have failed to realise the sun-lit logic of facts. Imbued with a fear of the prevalence of fraud they have apparently forgotten the very existence of honesty, and, counting up the fools, they have ended by doubting if there be any wisdom left.

The atmosphere in which these men work is full of doubt and suspicion, and few there be who, coming within its range, are not similarly impregnated. Failing to recognise good faith and honesty of purpose in others, it is matter for little surprise that they end in doubting their own. In their course of action is clearly seen the fruits of such an education. Finding avenues of investigation closing upon them by reason of the attitude they have adopted, they descend to insidious methods in the vain hope that by so doing they will find out, not the truth, but the tricks of mediums. Having collectively obtained an unenviable notoriety amongst sensitives for anything but fair and just dealing in their investigation, and being foiled in this direction, they seek by secret means, by the employment of conjurers and others unknown as having any connection with them, to visit mediums with the object of discovering the supposed fraud.

We should be wanting in our duty as Spiritualjournalists if we failed to sound a note of warning against methods which, though they may be very smart, are certainly not honest. Of their morality the less said the better. One thing, however, is certain: it would be fatal to any sensitive to be subjected to such influences, and we earnestly implore mediums and Spiritualists, for the sake alike of self-respect and the honour of Spiritualism, to be sedulously careful in regulating admissions to circles. No one should be allowed to gain entrance who is not introduced by a well-known Spiritualist.

In writing thus we expressly desire to guard against the possible misconception that we are opposed to rigid scientific investigation of spiritual phenomena. That is far from being the case. Conjointly, however, with the scientific method there is to be desiderated another absolute essential—a sympathetic, truth-loving spirit. The laurels of Spiritualism have been won from those who, having these attributes, have also brought to bear on the subject the same critical acumen and painstaking investigation of facts by which the triumphs of science have been characterised in other fields of inquiry. Scepticism is permissible provided it is honest; tests may be applied if preferred in good faith; but we strenuously deprecate the elements of deceit which have played so prominent a part in some quarters.

We have no fear of the result of investigation undertaken in a right spirit; indeed we look for victory, at no distant date, all along the line. Already Spiritualism can do more than hold its own, and if Spiritualists are loyal to their trust, no attacks—whether from foes without, or traitors within its ranks—can influence its destiny save for good. Spiritualists stand in the position of experts in respect to spiritual phenomena, and are the custodians of the avenues of investigation for these facts. It is, therefore, our bounden duty to see that speculative theorists, morbid hair-splitting sceptics, fraud-hunters, and, above all, the disbelievers in the average integrity and good faith of human testimony, have no opportunity to mar the work we have in hand, while at the same time every reasonable facility is afforded to the earnest, honest, and right-minded seeker for truth.

Obituary.

Mr. Frederick Hockley, after some years of illness and pain, passed away November 10th, in his seventy-seventh year, at his residence in Vernon Chambers, Bloomsbury. He maintained throughout his life an uninterrupted and active interest in occult science, commencing more than half a century ago with astrology. Then the study of the phenomena of animal magnetism prepared him for the intelligent comprehension of the subject of Spiritualism. Some of his experiences he related in the Spiritualist, particularly those which occurred at séances with Mr. and Mrs. Everitt. He furnished some interesting evidence to the Committee of the Dialectical Society. He particularly interested himself in the phenomena of the Mirror and Crystal, which he studied concurrently with the late Earl Stanhope, and in which he had, perhaps, a larger experience than any of his contemporaries. The communications which he received through the mirror—one of his mediums being a most remarkable seeress—were carefully recorded by him and bound up in volumes to form part of his extensive library, which included works in every department in occult science, including rare works on astrology. It is hoped that his library may be kept intact and made accessible to students of psychology.

It would be interesting if some of the intimate friends who, at the time of his departure, were preparing to present him with a memorial of respect, were to furnish a detailed account of his experience.

He maintained his interest in Spiritualism to the end, one of his latest visits being to Mr. Eglington, through whose mediumship he received, in writing between slates, a cherished communication from his long-departed wife, intimating that he would speedily rejoin her.

MR. ALARIC A. WATTS, one of the Assistant-Secretaries to the Board of Inland Revenue, and so well-known to our readers, has retired, after a period of over forty-two years' service in the Department.

MESSES. THOS. R. KNOX AND CO., New York, have just issued Mrs. Susan G. Horn's new book, "Next World Interviewed." Our readers will recall the popularity of Mrs. Horn's first book published some years ago, entitled "Strange Visitors."

AN American correspondent writes that an evening of quiet home reading of such books as Zollner's "Transcendental Physics" will bring to the earnest and honest investigator more joy and information as to the after life than a lifetime of fruitless search in the dark with no facilities for insight.

THE Spiritualistische Blätter of Leipzig is informed by its Swedish correspondent that the eminent writer, Dr. Carl von Bergen, has been gained to the cause of Spiritualism, and that he proposes to give public lectures upon the subject in the course of the ensuing winter.—Le Messenger.

At Lyons a weekly paper has appeared under the title of Le Spirite "devoted to the investigation of psychologic, magnetic, scientific, and social questions. It is open to Spiritists and Spiritualists of all shades, to materialists and to clericalists; but no questions of personality are admissible into its columns."

A DREAM.—We take the following from La Chronique of Brussels, of Jan. 30th, 1885: "I received in payment, some months back, a note of the Bank of France. I put it away very carefully in view of a journey to Paris, which I should have shortly to make. When the time came I looked for my note where I thought I had safely put it, but it was not there. My mind was painfully exercised about my loss. I went to bed entertaining suspicions, perhaps unjust. In the night I dreamed that I heard some one say, 'The note is at the back of the third compartment of the glazed cabinet.' I rose with the words still in my ears, lighted my candle, and found it there. I taxed my memory to the utmost, and could find no recollection whatever of having placed it there; now, how could the idea of an act of which I had no conscious remembrance have been impressed upon my brain? I think this is a question for mind-readers and physiologists. F.C."—Le Messenger.

RECORDS OF PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

[In this column will be given from time to time such accounts of psychical phenomena as seem to be worthy of permanent record. Beyond the general classification indicated, no attempt at tabulation will at present be made; that work will follow in due course. In furtherance of this object we shall be pleased to receive from our readers brief reports of phenomena subject to two conditions: (1) That a colourless statement of facts without comment is given; and (2) that communications are accompanied by the names and addresses of those concerned, not necessarily for publication, though we should naturally prefer to be at liberty to publish them. Amongst the phenomena referred to may be mentioned:—

- | | |
|---|---|
| A.—Mesmerism. | M.—Rappings, Knockings, and Stone Throwings. |
| B.—Trance. | N.—The Spirit Voice and Clair-audience. |
| C.—Clairvoyance. | O.—Psychography. |
| D.—Thought-reading. | P.—Automatic Writing. |
| E.—Prescience, Previsional and Coincidental Dreams. | Q.—Movement of Material Objects without Physical Contact. |

Friends having had experience of any of these phenomena will be doing us a service if they will report them to us, giving—

- (2) The circumstances under which the phenomena took place.
- (3) A brief account of the occurrence.

Letters should be addressed to the Editor of "LIGHT," 16, Craven-street, Charing Cross.]

[We have received from Mr. Charles William Rohner, M.D., Tungamah, Victoria, Australia, several cases which he informs us have come under his personal observation.]

CLASSES A. AND C.—MESMERISM AND CLAIR-VOYANCE.

A Mr. Crone, now of Melbourne, mesmerised a boy thirteen years old, who, in a state of deep trance, told me the time on my watch four times within the space of two hours correctly. The fourth time, thinking the boy might possess a peculiar faculty of guessing the time, I altered it by turning the hands round, forward and backward, so that I could not tell myself at what figures they stopped. The boy answered correctly, that the time on my watch was twenty minutes past four. It was about 10 p.m. at the time he said so. I considered this a good test. The boy's eyes were bandaged at the time, and his face turned from me towards the wall. The boy was also perfectly insensible and unconscious of pain when at the time of the above experiment I inserted my penknife under the thumb-nail of his left hand.

CLASS N.—CLAIRAUDIENCE.

One night I retired to bed at eleven o'clock p.m. A voice sung out plaintively, "Doctor, doctor!" kept me from sleeping until 4.30 a.m., when I fell asleep, the voice ceasing. At 6.30 I was called to a midwifery case in the country, fifteen miles from my residence, and when I came to the bedside of my patient I recognised the voice at once. The patient told me, moreover, that she had been singing out for me all night, but fell asleep after four o'clock on account of the pains ceasing about that time. She was a young woman and the wife of a farmer of the name of William Ryan, of Indigo Creek, near Chiltern, Victoria.

CLASS G.—DOUBLE, OR PRESENCE AT A DISTANCE.

A serious accident befell my second eldest boy, William, on 17th of March, 1869, viz., fracture of skull. I was at the time one-and-a-half miles from my residence, and Mrs. R. saw me standing opposite her bed looking sad, bloodmarks soiling my white alpaca coat. She asked her nurse, Mrs. Hourigan, of Chiltern, what was the matter, but the nurse did not see me. Then Mrs. R. said some accident must have happened to me, for "I see he is bleeding from the left temple." This vision of my double (I) took place at 4.30, and about the same time when I was earnestly thinking of my wife, and the shock it would give her when hearing the sad news.

CLASS N.—THE SPIRIT VOICE.

Some nine years ago, whilst visiting a patient who suffered from a severe attack of typhus fever, I asked myself mentally cannot) an unconscious secondary self, at all events what Mr. Myers describes is not a secondary self of Mrs. Newnham's at all, because she can neither at the moment, nor afterwards, identify its actions as her own; it is precisely what we Spiritists contend for, viz., a primary self of some other person—of some alien intelligence in close temporary relationship with the brain and body of Mrs. Newnham, as also with the intelligence of Mr. Newnham. And this remark applies to all that Dr. von Hartmann, or Messrs. Myers and Gurney write about a conscious, or unconscious, secondary self. They are simply describing the ordinary self of another person, not a secondary self of the same person. (By-the-way, my friends, the Psychical Researchers, are adding as alarmingly to the Queen's English as the Spiritists and Theosophists have already done. We must soon have a new dictionary. The last number of the Proceedings literally bristles with a terminology which makes it appear like some manual, not of psychology, but of physiology, or therapeutics. Surely, surely, we are on the wrong tack! Physiology is a blind alley, an unreliable ally—must we, indeed, throw this sop to the Zeitgeist Cerberus, or won't he let us pass?) Let the writers seriously ask themselves how there can be an unconscious self—i.e., one that does not distinguish its own states of thought and feeling, recognise them for this or that, or as part and parcel of the same remembered system or order? For unless I can recognise a feeling, sensation, or idea as like or unlike other feelings, sensations or ideas which I (the same I, implicitly known to be the same) have experienced before, or am experiencing now, how can I discriminate, or classify, in other words, how can I know or even feel? But can I do this without consciousness? I do not think either Mr. Myers, or Dr. von Hartmann can! Yet here is Mrs. Newnham (Mr. Myers says) discriminating and knowing the questions of her husband sufficiently to be able to answer them, without being conscious of these questions! and framing appropriate answers without being conscious that she is doing so! though watching, and blankly expectant as to the only conscious self she, poor thing! is at all aware of possessing. Now have we glided, peradventure unawares, into Alice's Wonderland, and are we porchance listening to the hatter, the Duchess, and the White Knight? Rather than postulate this, let us dispense with all pretence of a "self" at all, and stick boldly to "unconscious cerebration," making it merely a physical process from beginning to end. Then the questions of Mr. Newnham made vibrations in his wife's "dextro-cerebral" ideational, and word-hearing centres, and these jolted out muscular motions of her hand through one of her word-writing centres—which constantly turned out to be all right for the intelligent understanding of both Mr. and Mrs. Newnham, when they became aware of this rather singular occurrence!! The objections to that view seem pretty plain.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

D. B.—Received with thanks. Will be used.

FACULTIES OF THE BLIND.—There is now exhibiting in Atlanta, Georgia, a family of negroes, named Williamson, three brothers and four sisters, all blind from birth; their parents were field-slaves of S. Carolina, who had seven other children all born with sight. The blind were brought up at the State Asylum for the Blind; they are very intelligent, with excellent well-disciplined voices. They form a travelling company to give entertainments which draw large audiences. The eldest brother has married a clever coloured woman who acts as manager and secretary. They not only sing but play well on different musical instruments. They also imitate different musical instruments with their voices—a brass band or organ for instance. They have so trained their sense of touch that they can describe the features of people by touching over the face. One of the items of their entertainments is standing in line hand-in-hand, an object is put in the eldest brother's hand at one end and any one of the line can say what the object is; he says it seems to him that a magnetic current passes through the line, starting from him, conveying impressions of the object.—Golden Gate.

make one individual. As to the hypnotic experiments (Fortnightly Review, November), I quite agree with Dr. Wylid that they do not make at all against personality; for in them the experience of one condition is transmitted, more or less completely, into the other, and all are resumed in the deeper trance more completely still. Free-Will is left much as it was before. The Will is only free in the higher non-moral, eternal self, in harmony with the universe. But the solidarity and unity of individuals in one body is beautifully illustrated by the experiments. "I am in them, and they in me, that all may be made perfect in one." There is no confusion here, but harmony. Fechner's book on a "Future Life" is, in some respects, most helpful.

THE EXPERIMENTAL RESEARCH SECTION

OF THE

LONDON SPIRITUALIST ALLIANCE

Has been established with the object primarily of—

Promoting systematic research by experts, including (a) the encouragement of exact methods of inquiry; (b) the accurate recording of observed facts; (c) the regulation of admission to and the graduation of circles, so as to afford a complete and progressive course of investigation and instruction; (d) the more careful treatment of mediums, and (e) the publication in the Spiritualist Press of carefully tabulated results.

And secondarily of—

Assisting inquiry into Spiritualism either by (a) directing inquirers, where necessary, in a preliminary course of reading; (b) advising in the formation of private family circles; or (c) where practicable furnishing introductions to already organised circles.

Members of the London Spiritualist Alliance are eligible for election to the Experimental Research Section. The minimum subscription to this section is £1 1s. per annum, payable in January for the current year, but it is hoped that persons interested in the extension of research will contribute to a special fund for that purpose.

The members of the Research Section are divided into four grades, viz.:—

1. CIRCLES OF EXPERTS.
2. ELEMENTARY CIRCLES OF INVESTIGATORS.
3. INQUIRERS (ALL UNDER).
4. A CENTRAL COMMITTEE OF CONTROL.

Circles of experts will study, at their own discretion and opportunity, special groups of phenomena. They will especially direct attention to the means of securing the best conditions of observation. Their experiments will be such as could not safely be made in a less harmonious circle, or by less experienced persons. They will so experiment as to throw light on perplexing problems, and generally to add to our now scanty store of knowledge as to the methods employed by the invisible operators, the results of whose action we are all more or less acquainted with, but of whose methods of operation we know almost nothing.

Inquirers into Spiritualism, upon becoming members of the Research Section, will, if desired, be introduced to some expert who will give the necessary advice and guidance; will direct their reading, if required; will give help in difficulty, and generally act as Mentor and sponsor to them, until, in due time, they become fit to take their place in an elementary circle of investigation. As circumstances allow, inquirers will be drafted into a circle of investigators, or if it be preferred they will be advised and directed in the formation of a private circle. The proceedings of each circle of inquirers will be under the charge of its Expert Director, who will manage the affairs of the circle in such a manner as may, from time to time, be necessary to facilitate its investigation.

GENERAL RULES.

All groups of circles of whatever degree are subject absolutely to the direction and governance of a Central Committee of Control. The names of all who desire to take part in these circles will be submitted to that Committee, and the election will be by ballot. Great care will be exercised in the selection of suitable persons, and their arrangement in circles so composed as to secure the utmost possible harmony. These circles will meet, each at its own convenience, in private houses for the most part, and their proceedings will be strictly private. They will be conducted by a Director elected in each circle by the members, subject to the approval of the Central Committee of Control; accurate minutes of all proceedings will be kept by a Recorder. These minutes, verified at the opening of each meeting, will be submitted at stated intervals to the Committee of Control, who alone will decide as to their publication. No publication will be permissible without the sanction of the Committee; and from its decision there will be no appeal. Each member of the various circles will pledge himself to keep all proceedings strictly private until authority is given for publication; and the names of the persons who constitute a particular circle need be known only to themselves and to the Committee of Control.

PLEDGES REQUIRED.

Those who wish to take part in this work will be invited to pledge themselves

1. To an ungrudging assistance, within reasonable bounds, to any fellow member who may be assigned to them for guidance.
2. To sink absolutely any private or personal feelings that may in any way be thought likely to interfere with the perfect harmony that must characterise an inquiry of this nature if success is to be attained; or that may be at variance with the spirit in which alone this investigation can be profitably undertaken.
3. To obey, and submit to the reasonable control, of the Central Committee, which is charged with the administration of this plan, and to preserve a faithful reticence as to any results obtained in any circle, until the records are published by order of that Committee.

No expression of opinion as to theories which may be held to account for observed facts, or acceptance of any special form of belief is sought from any member. The Central Committee of Control, however, regards psychical facts from a Spiritualist point of view, though it is by no means bound down to any special theory, and may, indeed, receive and canvass any that may be proposed; and the Spiritualist Alliance, as its name implies, is, as a body, professedly Spiritualistic.

CENTRAL COMMITTEE OF CONTROL.

The constitution of this body, together with other details explanatory of the general scheme of work will be found in the pamphlet entitled, "Spiritualism at Home and Abroad." Persons wishing to join the Experimental Research Section are requested, if already members of the London Spiritualist Alliance, to apply to the President, 16, Craven-street, Strand, who will enter into further communication with them on the subject. If not members of the Alliance, application will first have to be made to the Hon. Secretary, at the same address, and subsequently to the President for proposal as member of the Experimental Research Section.

WHAT IS SAID OF PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

J. H. FICHTE, THE GERMAN PHILOSOPHER AND AUTHOR.—"Notwithstanding my age (83) and my exemption from the controversies of the day, I feel it my duty to bear testimony to the great fact of Spiritualism. No one should keep silent."

PROFESSOR DE MORGAN, PRESIDENT OF THE MATHEMATICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.—"I am perfectly convinced that I have both seen and heard, in a manner which should make unbelief impossible, things called spiritual, which cannot be taken by a rational being to be capable of explanation by imposture, coincidence, or mistake. So far I feel the ground firm under me."

DR. ROBERT CHAMBERS.—"I have for many years known that these phenomena are real, as distinguished from impostures; and it is not of yesterday that I concluded they were calculated to explain much that has been doubtful in the past; and, when fully accepted, revolutionise the whole frame of human opinion on many important matters."—Extract from a Letter to A. Russel Wallace.

PROFESSOR HARE, EMERITUS PROFESSOR OF CHEMISTRY IN THE UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA.—"Far from abating my confidence in the inferences respecting the agencies of the spirits of deceased mortals, in the manifestations of which I have given an account in my work, I have, within the last nine months" (this was written in 1883), "had more striking evidences of that agency than those given in the work in question."

PROFESSOR CHALLIS, THE LATE PLUMERIAN PROFESSOR OF ASTRONOMY AT CAMBRIDGE.—"I have been unable to resist the large amount of testimony to such facts, which has come from many independent sources, and from a vast number of witnesses. . . . In short, the testimony has been so abundant and consistent, that either the facts must be admitted to be such as are reported, or the possibility of certifying facts by human testimony must be given up."—Clerical Journal, June, 1862.

PROFESSOR GREGORY, F.R.S.E.—"The essential question is this, What are the proofs of the agency of departed spirits? Although I cannot say that I yet feel the sure and firm conviction on this point which I feel on some others, I am bound to say that the higher phenomena, recorded by so many truthful and honourable men, appear to me to render the spiritual hypothesis almost certain. . . . I believe that if I could myself see the higher phenomena alluded to I should be satisfied, as are all those who have had the best means of judging of the truth of the spiritual theory."

LORD BROUGHAM.—"There is but one question I would ask the author, Is the Spiritualism of this work foreign to our materialistic, manufacturing age? No; for amidst the varieties of mind which divers circumstances produce are found those who cultivate man's highest faculties; to these the author addresses himself. But even in the most cloudless skies of scepticism I see a rain-cloud, if it be no bigger than a man's hand; it is modern Spiritualism."—Preface by Lord Brougham to "The Book of Nature." By C. O. Groom Napier, F.C.S.

THE LONDON DIALECTICAL COMMITTEE reported: "1. That sounds of a very varied character, apparently proceeding from articles of furniture, the floor and walls of the room—the vibrations accompanying which the sounds are often distinctly perceptible to the touch—occur, without being produced by muscular action or mechanical contrivance. 2. That movements of heavy bodies take place without mechanical contrivance, of any kind, or adequate exertion of muscular force by those present, and frequently without contact or connection with any person. 3. That these sounds and movements often occur at the time and in the manner asked for by persons present, and by means of a simple code of signals, answer questions and spell out coherent communications."

PROFESSOR BARRETT, F.R.S.E.—"I know and rejoice in the blessing Spiritualism has been to my own faith, and to that of several dear friends of mine. Moreover, I cordially recognise the fact that in bereavement and deep distress numbers have been cheered and consoled by the hope that Spiritualism has set before them. . . . So far from Materialism being true, I do not believe a single person has ever yet lived on this earth who has truly and heartily desired to know if an intelligent and personal existence be possible without our present bodily organism, and has steadily set himself to solve this supreme question with all the help he can gain from every source.—I say I do not believe any such earnest seeker after truth has ever failed to obtain a clear and definite answer in the affirmative."

CAMILLE FLAMMARION, THE FRENCH ASTRONOMER, AND MEMBER OF THE ACADEMIE FRANCAISE.—"I do not hesitate to affirm my conviction, based on personal examination of the subject, that any scientific man who declares the phenomena denominated 'magnetic,' 'somnambulic,' 'mediumic,' and others not yet explained by science to be 'impossible,' is one who speaks without knowing what he is talking about; and also any man accustomed, by his professional avocations, to scientific observation—provided that his mind be not blinded by that opposite kind of illusion, opinions, nor his mental vision blinded by that opposite kind of illusion, unhappily too common in the learned world, which consists in imagining that the laws of Nature are already known to us, and that everything which appears to overstep the limit of our present formulas is impossible—may acquire a radical and absolute certainty of the reality of the facts alluded to."

CHAS. W. F. VARLEY, F.R.S.—"Twenty-five years ago I was a hard-headed unbeliever. . . . Spiritual phenomena, however, suddenly and quite unexpectedly, were soon after developed in my own family. . . . This led me to inquire and to try numerous experiments in such a way as to preclude, as much as circumstances would permit, the possibility of trickery and self-deception. . . . He then details various phases of the phenomena which had come within the range of his personal experience, and continues: "Other and numerous phenomena have occurred, proving the existence (a) of forces unknown to science; (b) the power of instantly reading my thoughts; (c) the presence of some intelligence or intelligences controlling those powers. . . . That the phenomena occur there is overwhelming evidence, and it is too late now to deny their existence."

ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, F.G.S.—"My position, therefore, is that the phenomena of Spiritualism in their entirety do not require further confirmation. They are proved, quite as well as any facts are proved in other sciences, and it is not denial or quibbling that can disprove any of them, but only fresh facts and accurate deductions from those facts. When the opponents of Spiritualism can give a record of their researches approaching in duration and completeness to those of its advocates; and when they can discover and show in detail, either how the phenomena are produced or how the many sane and able men here referred to have been deluded into a coincident belief that they have witnessed them; and when they can prove the correctness of their theory by producing a like belief in a body of equally sane and able untheorists—then, and not till then, will it be necessary for Spiritualists to produce fresh confirmation of facts which are, and always have been, sufficiently real and indisputable to satisfy any honest and persevering inquirer."—Miracles and Modern Spiritualism.

DR. LOCKHART ROBERTSON.—"The writer" (i.e., Dr. L. Robertson) "can now no more doubt the physical manifestations of so-called Spiritualism than he would any other fact, as, for example, the fall of the apple to the ground, of which his senses informed him. As stated above, there was no place or chance of any legerdemain, or fraud, in these physical manifestations. He is aware, even from recent experience, of the impossibility of convincing anyone, by a mere narrative of events apparently so out of harmony with all our knowledge of the laws which govern the physical world, and he places these facts on record rather as an act of justice due to those whose similar statements he had elsewhere doubted and denied, than with either the desire or hope of convincing others. Yet he cannot doubt the ultimate recognition of facts of the truth of which he is so thoroughly convinced. Admit these physical manifestations, and a strange and wide world of research is opened to our inquiry. This field is new to the materialist mind of the last two centuries, which even in the writings of divines of the English Church, doubts and denies all spiritual manifestations and agencies, be they good or evil."—From a letter by Dr. Lockhart Robertson, published in the Dialectical Society's Report on Spiritualism, p. 24.

NASSAU WILLIAM SENIOR.—"No one can doubt that phenomena like these (Phrenology, Homeopathy, and Mesmerism) deserve to be observed, recorded, and arranged; and whether we call by the name of mesmerism, or by any other name, the science which proposes to do this, is a mere question of nomenclature. Among those who profess this science there may be careless observers, prejudiced recorders, and rash systematisers; their errors and defects may impede the progress of knowledge, but they will not stop it. And we have no doubt that, before the end of this century, the wonders which perplex almost equally those who accept and those who reject modern mesmerism will be distributed into defined classes, and found subject to ascertained laws—in other words, will become the subjects of a science." These views will prepare us for the following statement, made in the Spiritual Magazine, 1864, p. 336: "We have only to add, as a further tribute to the attainments and honours of Mr. Senior, that he was by long inquiry and experience a firm believer in spiritual power and manifestations. Mr. Home was his frequent guest, and Mr. Senior made no secret of his belief among his friends. He it was who recommended the publication of Mr. Home's recent work by Messrs. Longmans, and he authorised the publication, under initials, of one of the striking incidents there given, which happened to a near and dear member of his family."

WHAT CONJURERS SAY ABOUT PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

Mediums, who are the instruments of an external agency, have, more than once, been confronted with conjurers who deceive by sleight of hand; and in the same manner that no man of science who has thoroughly and fairly investigated the phenomena has failed to become convinced of their reality, so no conjurer who has been confronted with the same facts has been able to explain their occurrence by prestidigitation. Houdin, Jacobs, Bellachini, Hermann, Kellar, and others have already confessed their powerlessness to produce under the same conditions what occurs without human intervention in the presence of a medium.

Testimony of Robert Houdin.

The Marquis Endes de Mirville published during the lifetime of Houdin two letters from the latter, in his "Mémoire adressé à MM. les membres de l'Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques, sur un grand nombre de phénomènes merveilleux intéressant également la Religion, la Science, et les hommes du Monde," in which the conjurer confesses his inability to explain the phenomena he witnessed in the presence of Alexis, the clairvoyant. A circumstantial account is given of M. de Mirville's visit to Houdin for the purpose of engaging him in this investigation, of the latter's confidence in his own ability to detect the trick, and of what took place at the séance, the conditions of which were entirely under Houdin's control. This account extends over twelve pages, and its accuracy is confirmed by Houdin in the first of the documents now translated:—

"Although very far from accepting the eulogies which M. ——— is good enough to bestow upon me, and especially insisting that I am not at all committed to opinions, either in favour of magnetism or against it, I can, nevertheless, not refrain from declaring that the facts above reported are entirely correct (tant de la plus complète exactitude), and that, the more I reflect upon them, the more impossible I find it to rank them among those which belong to my art and profession."

4th May, 1847.

ROBERT HOUDIN.

A fortnight later, M. de Mirville received another letter, in which the following, referring to another séance, occurs:—

"I have, therefore, returned from this séance as astonished as it is possible to be, and persuaded that it is utterly impossible that chance or skill could ever produce effects so wonderful (tout à fait impossible que le hasard ou l'adresse puisse jamais produire des effets aussi merveilleux).—I am, monsieur, &c."

Testimony of Harry Kellar.

Harry Kellar, a distinguished professor of legerdemain, investigated the slate-writing phenomena which occurred in the presence of Mr. Eglinton, at Calcutta, in January, 1882, and on the 25th of that month he addressed a letter to the editor of the Indian Daily News, in which he said:—

"In your issue of the 13th January I stated that I should be glad of an opportunity of participating in a séance with a view of giving an unbiased opinion as to whether, in my capacity of a professional prestidigitator, I could give a natural explanation of effects said to be produced by spiritual aid."

"I am indebted to the courtesy of Mr. Eglinton, the Spiritualistic medium now in Calcutta, and of his host, Mr. J. Meugens, for affording me the opportunity I craved."

"It is needless to say I went as a sceptic, but I must own that I have come away utterly unable to explain, by any natural means, the phenomena that I witnessed on Tuesday evening. I will give a brief description of what took place."

After describing several successful experiments, Mr. Kellar proceeds:—

"In respect to the above manifestations, I can only say that I do not expect my account of them to gain general credence. Forty-eight hours before I should not have believed anyone who described such manifestations under similar circumstances. I still remain a sceptic as regards Spiritualism, but I repeat my inability to explain or account for what must have been an intelligent force that produced the writing on the slate, which, if my senses are to be relied on, was in no way the result of trickery or sleight of hand."

On the 30th of the same month Mr. Kellar addressed another letter to the Indian Daily News, reporting some experiences of another kind with Mr. Eglinton, and regarding which he said:—

"In conclusion, let me state that after a most stringent trial and strict scrutiny of these wonderful experiences I can arrive at no other conclusion than that there was no trace of trickery in any form; nor was there in the room any mechanism or machinery by which could be produced the phenomena which had taken place. The ordinary mode by which Maskelyne and other conjurers imitate levitation or the floating test could not possibly be done in the room in which we were assembled."

The Testimony of Professor Jacobs.

Professor Jacobs, writing to the editor of Light, under Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—

"Spite of the assertions, more or less trustworthy, of the French and English journalists, and spite of the foolish jealousies of ignorant conjurers, I feel it my duty to show up the bad faith of one party and the chicanery of the other. All that has been said or done adverse to these American mediums is absolutely trustworthy. If we would rightly judge of a thing we must understand it, and neither the journalists nor the conjurers possessed the most elementary knowledge of the science that governs these phenomena. As a prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the mediævistic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect."

"Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. If (as I have every reason to hope) the psychical studies, to which I am applying myself at this time, succeed, I shall be able to establish clearly, and that by public demonstration, the immense line of demarcation which separates mediævistic phenomena from conjuring proper, and then equivocation will be no longer possible, and persons will have to yield to evidence, or deny through predetermination to deny."

"Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also the individuality of the spirit in 'spiritual manifestation.' I authorise you, dear sir, to insert this letter in your next number, if agreeable to you," &c., &c.

Testimony of Samuel Bellachini.

Samuel Bellachini, Court Conjurer at Berlin, made the following declaration in December, 1877:—

"I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Bern; Butlerov, in St. Petersburg, to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the 'How' of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a notary and witnesses."

Berlin, December 6th, 1877.

ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By "M.A. (Oxon)."

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct séances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experiences in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two, of negative, passive temperament, and preferably of the female sex, the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each sitter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Scepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitter spirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear. Patience is essential, and it may be necessary to meet ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such a trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful séance.

The first indications of success usually are a cold breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twitchings of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not aiding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over, but not in contact with, it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if it attempts to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might disconcert an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will check noisy manifestations.

Lastly, try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your reason. Do not enter into a very solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well-grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.

CLASS L.—MATERIALISATION.

J. Skipsey, L. T. Rendel, G. Wilson, and I arranged to invite the medium Mrs. Mellon to hold a private séance in a house of our own choosing and under conditions of our own arranging. A sitting-room in Mr. Skipsey's house was chosen for the purpose, and the séance took place on Wednesday, October 14th, at 7 p.m. L. J. Rendel and I went up at 6.30, and hung two curtains from a projecting part of the ceiling in one corner of the room, and arranged the chairs, &c. The curtains were nailed to the ceiling and side walls; a portion lay on the ground; they overlapped a few inches in the centre but were not fastened together in any way; a chair was placed inside for the medium. The sitters were placed in the form of a horseshoe, and I sat near one of the ends. The door was locked, and I put the key in my pocket. Mrs. Mellon took her seat behind the curtain, and the gas was lowered. Mrs. Mellon came in quite an unprofessional capacity and took no part in any of the arrangements; she is slightly made, rather small and delicate looking and was dressed in a very simple way. When conversation flagged, hymns were sung to fill up the time between the various manifestations. After Mrs. Mellon had been seated for a short time she began to speak in a loud but decidedly infantile voice under the supposed "control" of the spirit of a child called "Cissy." She first said "Oh, what a lot of 'folkses,'" and after asking Mr. and Mrs. Skipsey to change places, and having told us to join hands, she then proceeded to ask each person, beginning with Mrs. Skipsey, how they were, and when she came to a stranger, she put the additional question, "Is 'ou a big 'skleptic?'" She seemed to have a childish difficulty in pronouncing some of our names; when she came to me she remarked that I was always laughing, and that I shut my eyes when I laughed, also observing that she could see us quite well although she was behind the curtain, and in practically total darkness, and judging from this remark and sundry others which she made, she certainly appeared to be able to do so. She told me she was going to do her best to convince us, and seemed to quite realise my wish for some real proof. A chair had previously been placed just outside the curtain with a piece of paper and a pencil on it in case it should be needed. Presently the curtains were opened and a form appeared, which spoke in a gruff voice and was known by his previous acquaintances by the name of "Geordy" (the North country for George). He attempted to make use of the paper and pencil, but knocked the pencil over. Mrs. Skipsey looked for it, and replaced it on the chair. He made a few remarks to myself and some of the others, and I asked him if he could not let us see him materialise outside the curtains, upon which he said he would try. He then scrawled on the paper, crumpled it up, and threw it into the middle of the room. The scrawl appears to me to be intended for "Mr. Garratt," and after shaking hands in a very violent manner with Mrs. Hammerbon he again disappeared behind the curtain.

Presently we observed a faint luminosity at a point on the floor distinctly in front of the curtain. The gas was very low as George said he could not stand more, but we could see everybody in the room, and as the object under inspection was slightly luminous it could be discerned distinctly enough to put delusion out of the question, especially as everybody's subsequent description agreed in the main. This faint luminosity gradually grew in size and distinctness, and appeared as a small heap about a foot high. It then increased in height, and as it rose it became agitated in a wavelike manner, having rather the appearance of a column of steam. This process went on until the substance assumed the shape of a tall draped figure, which after various movements retired behind the curtain. Here it was suggested that the crack under the door should be filled up as the light coming through it rather interfered with our observations. When Mrs. Skipsey was filling up the crack with a handkerchief "Geordy" came out and touched her on the back and retired again. After some time "Cissy" left her medium to materialise; at any rate a white draped form apparently of a little girl came from behind the curtain, moved a chair about, threw kisses to some of the audience, and retired. I saw her very distinctly; she was quite a little girl, and from her easy movement and general deportment I am quite certain that she could not have been the medium in a compressed form. She returned to her medium and told us that George was going round the circle to collect power, and while he was doing so we had a considerable conversation with her and among ourselves; when suddenly I noticed a faint column of mist about the size of a man pass me, and go towards the curtain; Mrs. Wilson also noticed the same thing, and we were then informed that George had got back to the medium. The building up process was then repeated in precisely the same way as before, and George appeared again. He now told "Cissy" to get up, at which she grumbled, and then the forms of both George and the medium appeared at the opening in the curtain at once; they appeared several times, and although we could only see their heads properly, now and then catching glimpses of their shoulders and arms, there was certainly the form of "Geordy," and the medium visible at once and two entirely different voices conversing with each other, and overlapping sufficiently to satisfy us that both could not have proceeded from the same person. The medium was then replaced on the chair, presumably by "Cissy," and after some further conversation she and "Geordy" wished us good night, and then after a few moments, Mrs. Mellon asked, in her natural voice, whether the séance was finished. She said she was quite unconscious all the time, and when she came out she was certainly looking very pale and languid, and complained of having a head-ache.

PHASES OF MATERIALIZATION.

IN THE

OBJECTIVE PHENOMENA OF SPIRITUALISM

By "M. A. (Oxos)."

Mr. Colley and Dr. Donald Kennedy, of Boston, U.S.A., both give precise testimony as to this re-absorption of the vital force of the medium, which had been temporarily withdrawn, and so strangely used.

Mr. Colley records* among others a séance held at the house of a friend of his near London, at which Dr. Kennedy was present. The occurrences were much the same as those witnessed by me; but in this case the form was that of a young girl. Mr. Colley describes what must have been a close and convincing view of what took place when the form disappeared.

"When the form at last retired, I was permitted to accompany it until I was close to Dr. Monck, as he stood full in view of all. As it neared him the gossamer filament which unites the form to the medium again came into view, the vanishing point being towards the heart. By means of this cord I saw how the figures seemed to be sucked back into the body of the medium. Like a waterspout at sea, the superior vital power of Dr. Monck drew on the spirit form gradually, so that I was enabled to watch the process, 'for, leaning against, and holding, the medium, with my left arm at his back, and my left ear and cheek to his breast, his heart beating in a most violent and alarming way, I saw him receive back into his person' the form before distinct from him. I marked its fair aspect, eyes, hair, and delicate complexion, and kissed the dainty hand as, in process of absorption, it dissolved into the medium."

Respecting the method of formation of the materialized figure I may here introduce a description of a séance communicated to "LIGHT" (July 11th, 1885) by Mr. Barkas.

"On Friday evening, Sept. 3rd, 1875, a séance for materialization was held in an upper sitting-room, the size of which was 14ft. 6in. by 12ft. 6in. In one corner of the room an angle 4ft. by 3ft. 9in. was screened by a suspended curtain. Sitting in a quadrant of a circle and at a distance of from six to seven feet from the curtain, were the following persons, who sat in the order recorded: Mr. Mo., Mr. M., Mrs. H., an American; Mr. H., a gentleman from Edinburgh; Miss P., Mr. F. H., Mr. Barkas, Mr. P. The medium was Mrs. P., a married lady about forty years of age.

"We first sat hand in hand round a table and had knocks and writing, instructing us to put the table within the curtained recess above referred to, and sit for materialization outside of the recess. The medium Mrs. P., and her little daughter, Fanny, sat on two chairs facing the curtained recess at a distance of three feet from the curtain. The company sat, also facing the curtain, a distance of about seven feet from it as above described. A lamp was burning within three feet of where I sat and with such brightness that I could see all persons in the room and could easily read time by my watch. I could see both mediums with ease, and the space between them and the curtain.

"After sitting about fifteen minutes we were told to remove the table from the recess, and materialization would take place. The table was removed, and mediums and sitters sat in the open room in the same order as before.

"After sitting about ten minutes a small, white, flickering, flame-like substance about the size of a man's hand, appeared above the knees of the lady medium, her hands being by her sides during the whole of the séance. It increased and diminished in size and brightness, and at last continued to grow until it covered the head, shoulders, and body of the medium in a fleecy, white, semi-transparent cloud. It then took a more solid and definite shape, and descending to the floor, appeared like a young female, at least five feet in height. This form moved freely about the room, was visible about fifteen minutes, and gradually declined in height and width where it stood, until the form was about eighteen inches high, and during the whole time I saw the hand of the medium hanging passively at her side. This small, white form again began to rise and increased in bulk, until it resembled a stooping old lady, who moved freely on the floor: she wore white, flowing garments, and had on her head a large, old-fashioned, Quaker-like bonnet; she touched the hands of four of the sitters, taking them between her finger and thumb, and also permitted them to feel her dress. This animated form was visible for about twenty-five minutes, and at one time it increased greatly in bulk, rose to a height of about eight feet, and completely overshadowed the medium. The form again descended, assumed a normal size, and coming forward past the lady medium took a hand of one of the sitters between its finger and thumb; the form then returned to a position about two feet from the medium, and four feet from where I sat, and gradually declining in size and distinctness it flickered away on the carpeted floor. This closed a very remarkable séance. I have, without comment, given a plain, unvarnished record of facts, which could be confirmed, if necessary, by those who were present.

"T. P. BARKAS, F.G.S."

"Central Exchange, Newcastle-on-Tyne."

If these cases had occurred only in the presence of any particular medium, the evidence for their reality is such as could not be put aside, if we are to accept human testimony to these phenomenal occurrences. It would, indeed, have been necessary to say of them that they lacked corroborative evidence; and it would have been discreet to hold them over until such evidence came. The fact that phenomena of this class were at that time observed in the presence of a secluded medium made it impossible for us to do more than guess what took place. Since that time the use of cabinets and curtains to conceal what we all so much desire to watch has slowly and surely decreased, until recently we have had the full record of a materialization occurring in the midst of a dozen observers. This record, to which I have more than once referred, illuminates while it confirms my own observation with Monck so far as the process of construction of the form is involved. I do not doubt that we shall have in due time corroboration of the process of absorption of the form into the medium's body.

Meantime, so far back as the year 1880,* we have a record by Mr. John Mould, of Newcastle, of a séance with Miss Wood which is instructive and to the point. The medium was screwed into a cabinet, or closet, which had been constructed by the Newcastle Spiritual Evidence Society in their own room. After half-an-hour's waiting "a nebulous mass of white appeared on the outer side of the curtain used to screen the light from the medium (the door of the cabinet was made of wire-netting), and we patiently observed the lateral and perpendicular movement of the mass until it reached a height of about four feet and a-half, when the form approached and shook hands with the eleven persons present." This small form was requested to move in various ways, and at once did so. It was desired that it should vanish on the spot where it stood without retiring to the medium in the cabinet. It "exhibited slight movements for a few seconds, as if waves were passing over the whole structure, then it suddenly became invisible." That is much what I observed with Monck; Mr. Colley was more fortunate in having a closer view of the process. "After the disintegration of the form," Mr. Mould adds, "we observed a residuum of white like a nebulous mass." A repetition of the experiment was asked for, when "very decided movements were seen going on in the residual mass, the white substance becoming brighter and denser and more expansive until it was so fully developed that we heard the voice speaking to us again." Here we have formation, dissipation, and re-formation of the figure under the observers' eyes. This, read in connection with other cases already referred to, will be sufficient to show that the process of construction of a materialized form has been more than once carefully observed.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[It is preferable that correspondents should append their names and addresses to communications. In any case, however, these must be supplied to the Editor as a guarantee of good faith.]

The Phenomenality of the Subject.

SIR,—From paragraph 2, in Mr. Gurney's second letter, it is evident that the issue between us turns mainly on the nature of the "subject-object." That, Mr. Gurney says, is not the organism, and, therefore, I do not help myself by showing that it is the condition of perception. "I agree," he says, "that in reflection I can make myself a sort of object. I can think over the various 'subjective aspects' which have fallen to my lot, and think of each of them as mine, and of the united whole of them as me, as distinct from the not-me which gave them their objective aspects." Now this account of the subject-object, as originating in developed reflection—by "thinking over"—and as an abstraction from an experience in which the two aspects are already discriminated, is quite remote from my conception of it, as the very first object constructed in consciousness, and the condition of all perception of other objects. Nor is the primary reflection which first distinguishes me and not-me to be confounded with the reflection which could effect such an abstraction as Mr. Gurney describes, an abstraction which I believe in point of fact never is effected, except as a philosophical exercise. Nay more: the subject-object is even prior to the first reflective discrimination of the aspects; we get that object itself before we analyse it into me and not-me, and it first stands for me in relation to all other objects. Undoubtedly the infant first knows itself as its body. "When he" (the infant), as Mr. Shadworth Hodgson says, "learns to say 'I' and 'me,' he has already learnt that percepts are things; and his 'me' is a thing among things, a percept among percepts. . . . If he could speak analytically, his earliest post-reflective language would be: This thing or group of percepts is 'me,' those other things, or groups of percepts are 'my' percepts. For this reason, that his own body has been by him classed with and separated from other surrounding groups of percepts, that is, feelings and thoughts, by primary consciousness, before the particular perception arises that one of these groups, his body, has the feelings which constitute that and the other groups of percepts. This perception it is which is indicated by calling 'me' that group to which the others belong, or round which they seem to cluster, and which is always present when any of the others are."* Now that is what I mean by the subject-object—the organisation and combination of feelings into an objective representation of self—a phenomenon in the truest sense, just as much as "the lamp and all other phenomena," and not at all as "the result of a process of abstraction."

Having removed all possible ambiguity on this point, we shall be better able to see whether Mr. Gurney has successfully met my contention that this phenomenon, or subject-object, is a necessary condition of all other objects or phenomena in perception. I submit that he has not really met it at all. He has put forward a conception of the subject-object which is completely different from my own conception, and to which my argument is quite inapplicable. Certainly I could not posit Mr. Gurney's mental abstraction in space, or make it do duty for an organism. Nor do I at all see how he himself connects it with his admission of a local Ego-point as necessary to perception of objects in space. I endeavoured to show that this local point must be an objective representation in space of the self-consciousness—that is, a body. For this objective representation Mr. Gurney would substitute a subjective representation, the abstraction of developed reflection, which, by its very nature, could find no support whatever in space. I demanded a percept, and Mr. Gurney, without showing that this demand is illegitimate, offers me a concept instead, and then throws on my own shoulders the burden of showing that his concept corresponds with my "sensible existence." Of course it does not. So of his "ideal centre of spatial relations." I do not see how his abstraction gives that; ex hypothesi it would not give it as the condition, but only as the result of the general experience of space objects, an "abstraction" from them. But my whole argument was to show that you could not get a local centre of self-consciousness except as a "positing in space," and that this is more than the mathematical point. I hardly know if I may take as an admission the sentence: "If I had no visible and extended organism, if I had not found this in the world of external objects, though my experience of my world might be as keen and various as now, I do not think that the words 'space' and 'externality' could retain at all their present connotation." Now that really is just my contention. I do not want a local subject-object except for a world of objective space as now known to us; but I maintain, generally, that such as the objects perceived, such must be the self-representation of the subject. Mr. Gurney's instance of the symphony should help us to a better understanding of each other's position. If Mr. Gurney can enjoy music ideally and intellectually (as I believe all truly musical souls can, and as I wish mine could) the sound need not be localised, and we enter a world of other relations. I should have no doubt to contend that he will still represent himself therein to himself and others—if "others" there are—but under quite different modes of perception.

It is, perhaps, hardly necessary to add that I am not undertaking to show what the conditions are which give to other similarly constituted percipients a phenomenon of me corresponding to my phenomenon of myself. I can only say that this phenomenon is like all others. A world of similarly constituted percipients simply means a world of which the objective representations are similar for all.

But I quite admit that the organic character of the subject-object—the fact that the latter represents the whole system of relations with other objects which percipience implies—is not evinced by merely showing that some objective representation of myself is required for a local centre of consciousness. If Idealism is incompetent to answer Mr. Gurney's question, or criticism, on this head, I cannot deny that "the sensible object puzzles or should puzzle the Idealist by presenting nerve changes that are at once correlated with and irrelevant to his ideas." It was therefore that I adverted to Dr. Ingleby's "Law" of perception as offering the clue to this mystery from the Idealist point of view. Without attempting an exposition of that law here, I will only say that it is a developed application of that Copernican principle which Kant introduced into philosophy—the principle that when abiding by appearance leads to insuperable difficulties, we should proceed on the hypothesis that appearance is the exact inversion of truth, and see if we cannot thus arrive at a rational solution which shall be completely conformable to the facts underlying the appearance. Now since the apparent derivation of perception from an extended object in a "real" space is impossible as soon as we understand that the object is itself nothing else than percept, it follows that the relation between object and objective organism, which testifies to this false appearance, is not the true relation between percept and percipient. The principle in question suggests that it is the exact inversion of the true relation, and that therefore the phenomenal, receptive organism is an inverted representation of the subjectively real, constructive organism. I do not pretend that the correspondence has been exhibited in detail; but the following passage from Dr. Ingleby's book will show how strict he conceives it to be. "That mind is dependent upon organisation, which is already an established doctrine in physiology, will, I doubt not, be more and more confirmed by fresh inductions. For my own part, I believe that in the strictest sense, mind is as much a property of organised matter as double refraction is of a crystal of Iceland spar. But I have the highest assurance that I can obviate the least objection to the doctrine of spirituality which can be based on physiology. If it can be shown that the Ego nomen is constitutive of the organism, and that it is by virtue of an apperceptive Law of Reciprocal Causation that the manifestations of intelligence, or properties of organisation, are actuated, we may not only not view the speculations of materialistic physiologists with alarm, but we may hold out the prospect of utilising their researches in the sphere of psychology."*

C. C. M.

Von Hartmann's "Spiritism."

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—As the work in question is receiving a careful and detailed examination by some of your most competent correspondents, I will only offer a few detailed remarks which, however, seem to me to deserve consideration.

And first with regard to the author himself, and his moral and practical equipment for this special task. It appears to me that he is eminently unsuited for it, and to a degree which would make a satisfactory treatment of it by him next to impossible. I think even "C. C. M." might admit this, or even would be constrained to do so by the sound position which he has taken that "facts" can only be received and inwardly assimilated when viewed in the light of a "theory" which they realise and illustrate.

When I wrote "Let us have facts first and theories afterwards," I did not wish to be understood an pied de lettre. I only sought to enforce in a brief and rather flashy form the idea that the agents of the Psychical Society were neglecting their proper and most pressing duty in not investigating certain alleged phenomena, at least in any adequate manner. In my last letter to you I said distinctly "it is idle to pursue psychical research except on this foundation," viz., of a belief in the existence of spirits.

This being so, I am surprised that "C. C. M." has deemed this brochure of Von Hartmann so important, seeing that he is disqualified in limine for his self-appointed task. He believes in the visible universe, and in nothing beyond it. He has no belief in the existence of spirits. "C. C. M." has most truly said "people don't believe what they cannot at all understand." Von Hartmann cannot at all understand how spirits can exist, how then can he be a judge in this matter—how then can he be trusted to examine the evidence impartially? Must not all his reasonings be coloured by his non-belief?

Moreover not to believe in spirits, is not to believe in a hereafter. It also involves a non-belief in God or in any moral order of the universe—it is to be sunk in pure naturalism, in the wisdom of the senses.

I may advance a step further, and say that he is a Pessimist—in other words, he has no hope for a future after death, and but a poor hope, or rather flat despair as to the destinies of humanity on the earth. Here surely is an ample list of disqualifications.

But there is one more—he has no practical experience. Now this is wholly unpardonable: for he might have removed it at will but would not. Living in Germany, which boasts five Spiritualistic journals, which is, therefore, a land of séances, he has not attended one!! and yet he presumes to write on the subject! What should we think of a writer on chemistry, who naïvely avows in his preface that he never witnessed one chemical experiment, never made one chemical manipulation? A precious instructor such an one would be. I wonder he was not ashamed to make the avowal. It was not thus that Zollner proceeded. Undeterred by the accounts from England of Slade's trial and conviction, he determined to receive the whilom prisoner—the just-discharged convict—to witness his performance, and to make himself responsible for the result. This is a bright contrast to the conduct of Dr. von Hartmann, who yet is not ashamed to step forward to instruct the world as to what they ought to think of these things! He is quite willing to study reports of séances, and to tell us their scientific value, on the assumption of their truth; but by no means to make himself responsible for it, by assisting at any séance. Now this I call most ignoble conduct—a cowardly and selfish evasion of a manifest duty. His dearest concern is not to jeopardise his philosophical reputation. It is a comfort to reflect that this is cautiously safeguarded in any event.

He who has never attended a séance declares that it would be necessary "to attend a hundred séances at least" before delivering an opinion. If this is not absurd and random writing—quite unworthy of a great philosopher—I know not what can be. To act in this manner and to refuse time after time to acknowledge that which your senses and your judgment assure you of, is to destroy all self-reliance and to stupefy the mind. In the words of Lucretius:—

"Est violare fidem primam, et convellere tota, Fundamenta quibus nitatur vita salusque."

To act thus is to make the mind weaker at every fresh instance: it is the straight road to idiocy.

For the rest I will only now glance at some monstrous assumptions of our author.

1. The transference of hallucinations which we may call "the shade of a shadow." That one may have hallucinations is true, but the transference of them at will to another, much more to a circle, is about as inconceivable as anything can be; unless, indeed, we accept Mr. Myers' doctrine that what exists in any degree may be raised ad libitum to any "higher power." This would lead to very absurd results. Von Hartmann is bound to explain everything without calling in spirits. Hence he does not hesitate to make this sheer and monstrous assumption. We see in it the predetermination to view everything in one light only.

2. He does not believe in spirits, but he knows exactly what sort of beings spirits would be, did they exist. He says that spirits must be "bodiless," and being "invisible," can have "no power of manifestation."

Now we maintain the exact reverse of this. We maintain that "spirit must have a continent—that is a body—for that there is no such thing as naked thought; that it is never 'unclothed, but clothed upon,'—or in other words, that the visible and the invisible are in eternal alliance. But that visibility implies corresponding organs, therefore, by those who are in the same sphere, or for a time exalted to it, as was Paul (Cor. II.).

He further says spirits can have "no brains," no parts that can "support consciousness," "no muscles or bones," and therefore, no power to "lay hold or raise," or "to accomplish any dynamical effects except in a spiritual way," i.e., by illusion.

Now the whole of this is as contrary to philosophy as it is to an enlightened belief in spirits. That belief is—which was also that of Swedenborg—that a spirit has an organised form, complete in all its parts and functions; that it has all the human faculties in an enlarged and exalted degree; that in the truest sense the spirit body is more substantial than the mortal one; that it is an exchange of weakness for power, and that of every kind. In one word, there is a natural body, and there is a spirit body. Just in proportion as anything is gross and material is it weak, corruptible, and inert. It is the ethereal body, which alone is substantial, powerful, and incorruptible. These truths, supported though they be by innumerable facts, and by magnetic and electric science, are folly to a low-thoughted Pessimist, whose "eyes are always downward bent"—who has no aspirations, and no hopes.

I conclude with one instance more. Von Hartmann believes in two kinds of thought-transference, or rather of hallucination-transference: that which comes from one brain "whose vibrations induce similar vibrations in a human brain in proximity; and mechanical mediation by other vibrations—between persons in immediate proximity without contact." . . . But there is also "another kind of thought-transference without material mediation, which seems to be limited to no distance." He continues, "at far distances, according to our experiences, no thoughts or words whatever can be transferred, but only sensible and most lively hallucinations." He had said before that "nerve-force rapidly diminishes as the distance increases," according in fact to the square of the distance—how, then, are these lively hallucinations to be transferred from the antipodes, across the earth's diameter to the distant transferee?

Our philosopher is quite equal to the emergency. The transferer "being rooted in the absolute" is able to accomplish the feat. Though there be no no-spirit, and no physical copula or mediation, by taking "his stand in the Absolute"—the absolute, be it remembered, is also the Unconditioned—he is able to free himself from all the limitations of space, and is thus able to transfer his hallucinations—his airy nothings in their full picturesque and dramatic completeness to his dupes on the other side of the world!

Was there ever jargon equal to this? Was there ever metaphysical acrobat equal to our philosopher? Rather would I hold with Milton that there are spirits, and that

"So soft

And uncompounded is their essence pure,
Not tied or manacled with joint or limb,
Nor founded on the brittle strength of bones,
Like cumbrous flesh, but in what shape they choose,
Dilated or condensed—bright or obscure
They execute their airy purposes,
And deeds of love or enmity fulfil."

Numbers as a Means of Spirit Telegraphy.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Your correspondent "C. C. M." has recently, and with his usual lucidity, given more than one account of the curious recurrences of certain numbers in connection with the events of his life—recurrences which cannot be explained by the mathematical theory of probability. As I have had similar experiences, and as I believe I am the correspondent referred to in one of

"C. C. M.'s" communications as having some time ago written on the matter in "LIGHT," I wish to add to what I then said.

I can bear testimony to the apparently trivial way in which these communications are made. I use the word apparently advisedly, because one does not well know of anything really trivial; this, however, seems a minor matter. The question is, do these numbers, as they are presented, give evidence of an intelligent agent being concerned in their presentation? I believe they sometimes do.

My own experience is that there are at least two ways in which the numbers are brought into my consciousness. One way is, perhaps, through the agency of my second self, whatever that may be; the other, as I feel very strongly, is by means of an intelligent being, which being is not myself. When I am thinking about any matter—say study, illness, wealth, or any idea which can be represented by one word, not uncommonly other words, meaningless, except as to their numerical value, come into my mind—these suggested words are possibly the work of my second self, my sub-consciousness, or of anything else which is myself and yet not myself. But if I am mentally desirous of an answer to a serious and perplexing inquiry, the answer almost always slides in, as it were, when I am thinking of something else. Unless, then, I have two or more second selves I do not see how the second self explanation comes in here.

That the work is at times that of an intelligence outside myself the following story tends strongly to show. Just after Easter of this year, I was travelling in Belgium with one of my children. We had been for more than a week without news from home, and as I was expecting a letter from South Africa, from a son whose health was then still a cause of anxiety to me, my uneasiness became considerable. On the Sunday after Easter we were, during the morning service, in Antwerp Cathedral, and my anxiety culminated. I then made an earnest wish, or prayer, that if all were well, the number 107, which according to the method of reckoning adopted by "C. C. M." and myself is the value of the word happiness, should be presented to me in such a way that I myself could in no way influence its presentation. We left the cathedral, and went to the Musée Plantin; our umbrellas were taken from us by the concierge, and the number on the ticket given for them was 107! On reaching London, I found that the letter had come from South Africa, but had not been forwarded. I do not think either the telegraphic or the second-self theory will cover this.—I am, faithfully yours,

W. P.

Antiquated Laws.

SIR,—May I add to the information given by "C. C. M." respecting the facts which he was so very kind as to furnish me with for my pamphlet on the Slade case, that a fuller and more complete, though by no means more accurate statement, which also he was good enough to revise and approve as exact, is contained in a little pamphlet of mine entitled "The State of the Law as it affects Public Mediums." I fear it may be scarce now; but I will send some copies to the Psychological Press Association, 16, Craven-street, Charing Cross, so that they may be available.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Will you be kind enough to grant me space in your next issue to inform the large number of subscribers who have written to me, asking when the above work is to be published, that the volume is now in the press, and will be issued speedily. The heavy work incidental to a book of this character, the preparation of the etching and the eight chromo-lithographs, has considerably delayed its publication, but I am certain the subscribers will be surprised with the book when it reaches them. Those who have not remitted for copies ordered through me should do so at once to ensure certain delivery. After publication it can be obtained through the Psychological Press Association.—I am, sir, yours truly, Independent Mind Action in Psychography.

SIR,—It has been suggested by more than one inquirer into Spiritualism that the answers received by sitters, either in writing or by tilts and raps, come, not from any beings "beyond our ken" but are the results of the accumulated thoughts of the people present at the table; in fact, are the children of that "grey matter" (dear to the scientific mind) playing on the medulla, and sending forth those startling sentences which frequently answer our questions so completely.

That these answers are not in any way the result of thought-reading was very plainly shown in the most simple manner the other day at a séance with Mr. Eglinton. The medium took down a book from a shelf (it was a history of Ireland by some long-forgotten author), and without opening it asked those who were present to choose first the number of a page, then of a line in the page, and, lastly, a word in the line. These numbers were at once written down on a slate in full view. The numbers chosen were 14 for the page, 17 for the line, and 10 for the word. The word selected was to count from the end of the line.

Mr. Eglinton put the closed book on a slate, held it under the table flap, and then asked his guides if they would tell him the word that was wanted. Writing was heard on the slate, and, on taking it up, there was found written: "There are not ten words in the line, but the first word is 'remaining.'"

On referring to the book this was found to be literally correct.

As no one present had ever read the work it could be no far away, forgotten fact returning to the individual's consciousness at that identical moment, neither can any amount of accumulated thought result in setting forth the unknown.

Is not this "a beam in darkness"? Would that some of our great thinkers would say with our Laureate "let it grow."—I am, dear sir, yours truly,

A Weak Hypothesis.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—A careful perusal of the brochure of Von Hartmann's on "Spiritism," translated by Mr. C. C. Massey, brings to my mind the following passage that a "would-be" seant published some ten years since.

"Those who put themselves forward to attack the cherished beliefs of the world at large, are bound to master the whole of each question they bring under discussion, and not to content themselves with a one-sided or imperfect view of it, and they have no more right to put aside an evidential fact or deduction because it looks old and worn out, than adopt another without due examination, because it is new and specious. In particular, it behoves those who rest on experience as the basis of all knowledge to beware of excluding all experience save their own."—Dr. W. B. Carpenter, "Principles of Physiology: Responsibility for our Belief," p. 405.

Verily this is the voice of Esau, but the hands are the hands of Jacob, for who would have surmised that the proud engenderer of the "unconscious cerebration" hypothesis could write thus? Poor little weak hypothesis! where in the limbo of philosophical abortions art thou now? And here comes Von Hartmann's newly-born "transferred hallucinations." Behold! the shadowy little brat but sees "light" a moment, and a thousand experiences of non-hallucinated ones crush its feeble life out! Would that it could be at once buried decently out of sight; but, no! perhaps for the next quarter of a century its little bones will be flung in the faces of all those who are striving to clear the minds of their fellow creatures of real transferred hallucinations in order that they may see more clearly and enjoy life more fully and freely.

The italics in quotation are those of yours faithfully,

A VERY "IGNORANT PHILOSOPHER."

No man can learn of anything without some preparation for such learning, however near he may be to the thing to be learned of. A POINT FOR THE MIND CURE.—An Eastern watch-maker has declared that the magnetism of the wearer of a watch affects it as a time-keeper; that watches which gain or lose time on certain persons, run with regularity when hung up in his shop. One case in particular came under his notice. A lady brought him her watch very frequently, which she said at times gained and at other times lost; yet, when hanging in his shop, it ran with exactness. By investigation and inquiry, he found that the mental conditions of the owner were variable; when cheerful the watch gained time, when despondent the watch lost time.—San José Mercury.

GRADUATED CIRCLES.

There are some points in the Address of the President to the members of the London Spiritualist Alliance* that will bear expansion. They were of necessity handled briefly and traced in outline, though with sufficient clearness, in an address which was limited by time, and which traversed a large area literally bristling with subjects of interest and importance. We have already stated our belief that the long period of conflict and transition, of selfish apathy, and of idle curiosity, is passing away, and that the formation of the Alliance was the inauguration of a new and happier epoch. We entertain little doubt that the address in question will be found to inaugurate a new departure which will still further advance the cause we have at heart. The plan of practical research therein laid down comes as a natural and necessary consequence to the action of Spiritualists in respect to public and promiscuous circles and dark cabinets, just three years ago. The destructive process had its perfect work: the time has come for the constructive work to be organised.

It has been growing in definiteness, and taking form and shape during the past two years:—years which have been marked both by a clearing of the ground, and by a successful sowing of good seed, which those alone who have been concerned in the work can adequately appreciate. Bad methods have been abandoned, or rather have died out because the intelligence of men has outgrown them. As soon as attention was drawn to the conditions under which phenomena of a rare and obscure nature were investigated, their fate was sealed. To no set of people are Spiritualists more indebted than to such men as Sir G. Sitwell and Mr. von Bach, who, setting a very different purpose before them, drew prominent attention to our faulty methods of investigation. By their seizure of the spirit-form they did not, indeed, prove its identity with the medium, as they desired, and boasted that they had done, but they drove Spiritualists to inquire what might be expected to happen in case an independent form were thus rudely seized while the medium was in a state of trance, but beyond reach of observation by reason of darkness and seclusion in a cabinet. To this question no sufficient answer could be given without placing the medium under careful observation. It became manifest that this was the next step to be taken. Already one or two observers had been bold enough to demand such conditions of observation, and the results were conspicuously valuable.* Since that time our knowledge has been extended by repeated opportunities for observation in the presence of Mr. Eglinton, who has never shrunk from affording conditions of investigation which, however distressing to himself, are invaluable to the observer. We do not hesitate to say that Spiritualists owe to Mr. Eglinton a hearty acknowledgment of their obligation to him in this respect.

We have learnt much from the action of both foe and friend. We have learnt so much that we are disposed to wonder how the old bad methods of observation could have been tolerated so long. That the profoundest mysteries should have been subjected to what passed for scrutiny in a promiscuous circle of people, whose only qualifications too often were an itching curiosity and the possession of five shillings wherewith to gratify it, in a dark room, with every method of deluding the senses available;—this is now a source of wonder to us. We see that darkness may indeed be essential for the development of certain phenomena, but that these special phenomena should not be sought for in these promiscuous circles. It is not fair either to the operating intelligences, or to the observers, or to the medium, to conduct experiments in such a manner. We see further that to admit a neophyte to these inner mysteries without antecedent preparation is most unwise, productive usually of little good, calculated in most cases to bring about disastrous results. We have learnt that circles must be graduated, and that inquirers must learn the alphabet before they can expect to understand what they read. It is not too much to say that from this graduation of circles judiciously carried out, almost more than from any other single cause, the best results may be expected.

But this is not all. We are led to the belief that there are certain persons so unfortunately constituted as to be apparently unable to get any satisfactory evidence of psychical phenomena for themselves, and to be absolutely deterred by their very presence of the phenomena others may wish to observe. It is said, we do not know how truly, that some persons who are very desirous of witnessing such phenomena as occur, for instance, in the presence of Slade or Eglinton, are uniformly unable to do so. Their presence paralyses the force, apparently, and this in spite of a professed desire on their part to witness what others see without difficulty. It used to be a scoff against us in the mouths of such men as Professor Tyndall that the presence of a sceptic was fatal to the occurrence of psychical phenomena. If that were so, we wonder how the vast array of those who started from a standpoint of absolute scepticism, and who have reached conviction of the general truth of what Spiritualists believe, has ever been recruited. The truth is that scepticism has nothing whatever to do with the matter, except in so far as it is arrogant, dogmatic, virulent, and obstinately arrayed against the truth. The passive mind, whether favourably or unfavourably impressed, is usually sure of its evidence. But some there are who can apparently get none, and it will be interesting to see in the future whether improved methods of research will throw any light on the reasons for this singular psychical impenetrability, which in some observers wholly unfits them for the investigation, and amounts to a positive disense. For the present, at any rate, they are not suitable members of any circle of inquirers.

MRS. FRANCIS LEAN (Florence Marryat) announces her intention of publishing in her successful weekly, Once a Week, a series of remarkable incidents obtained through the different mediums with whom she has had sances.

"SPIRIT TEACHINGS."

(From "MIND IN NATURE.")

By A. N. WATERMAN.

The title of this work is sufficient to banish it, not only from the homes, but from consideration or notice, by a large portion of the community.

Spirit communication, so called, is looked upon with holy horror by some, and regarded by others as drivel, unworthy the consideration of an intelligent being.

It cannot be denied that there is reason for these opinions.

A great part, perhaps the greater part, of all said to be the teachings of spirits, is either so inconsequential, so fanciful, childish and silly, or so fanciful and visionary, as to make a sensible man ashamed of having listened to it.

The great number of intelligent people, however, who accept these revelations, not as necessarily truthful or trustworthy, but as actual voices from another world, renders the phenomena interesting to every person who desires to study matter, force, or man. It is, therefore, a pleasure to find a book in which is written the history of the development of a so-called medium, together with a large number of what purport to be communications by spirits, couched in plain and simple language, with no attempt at display of rhetoric, or ornamentation; without embellishment, by way of imagery or symbolism, and with no endeavour to be fanciful or poetical.

All that is here given is easily understood, and cannot well be misunderstood; all is elevating in tone, pure in morals, logical and consistent.

A theory of spiritual life; an explanation of the intercourse between this and the spiritual world; the reasons for, and methods pursued in the communications now being made; a statement as to the good and evil that may result therefrom, and as to the revelation of the Scriptures, and God's dealings with man, are contained in the "Teachings."

However much one may dissent from what is set forth, no one will be shocked by ridicule, blasphemy, want of dignity, or frivolity.

The spirit in which this "Teaching" is given, is well illustrated by the following extract from the words of "Imperator," in what purports to be a letter from a spirit who writes under that name.

"What we wish to impress on you is this: You must judge the Revelation of God by the light which is given you in the mass, not by the dicta of its preachers; by the spirit and general tendency, not by the strict literal phraseology."

"You must judge of us and our teaching, not by conformity to any statement made by any man, at any special time; but by the general fitness and adaptability of our creed to your wants, to your relations with God, and to the progress of your spirit."

"What, then, is the outcome of our teaching?" "How far does it square with your right reason?" "How does it teach you of God?" "How does it help your spirit?"

It has been well said:

"All religions, faiths, doctrines, should be studied at their best." Whoever desires to examine Spiritualism at its best, should read this book.

The author—Rev. W. Stainton Moses—who writes under the nom de plume "M.A. (Oxon.)," is a graduate of Oxford; is connected with the London University College; is one of the Vice-Presidents of the Society for Psychical Research, also a member of the Council, and, until very recently, a member of the Literary Committee of that Society. He has published a number of works on psychical subjects.

LET the end alone. None belongs to you; use it as wisely as you can. Work your best at once where you are; the end will work itself out with mathematical certainty.

The above list represents the remittances and promises which have reached us up to the time of going to press. The amount at present is not very encouraging, but as our friends have never failed us in the past, so we have no fear that they will do so now. "LIGHT" is steadily growing in circulation and influence, and promises at no very distant day to be not only self-supporting, but commercially profitable; and in the meantime we earnestly appeal for the assistance of all who are interested in our success, begging them to be both prompt and generous in their contributions. With more means at our command we could make our work more widely known, and thus hasten the time when such appeals as this will be no longer needed.

Remittances may be sent either to Mr. E. Dawson Rogers, Rose Villa, Church End, Finchley, N., or to Mr. M. Theobald, 62, Granville Park, Lewisham, S.E.

THE following remarkable incident is copied from Bailey's "Annals of Nottinghamshire," and happened at the siege of Newark, in 1644:—"Hercules Clay, a tradesman of Newark, and at this time mayor of the borough, dreamed three successive nights that his house was on fire. After awaking on the third occasion he arose, a good deal troubled, and awoke his family, requiring them immediately to leave the house, which they had no sooner done than a bomb, fired from Beacon Hill, fell on the roof, and passing through every floor set the house completely in flames. In commemoration of this merciful deliverance, he left a sum of money to the vicar, to be invested by him, in order that a sermon might be preached on the anniversary of that day (11th of March) for ever; and another sum, the interest of which, on the same occasion, should be distributed among the poor of Newark."

should we welcome our good friends of the psychical research persuasion, who come before the world with similar testimony, but in more cautious, scholar-like, and diplomatic guise, with some of the caustic humour, and fine ironical smile of Erasmus. There is place for Nicodemus, and for Paul.

But all honour to Spiritists also! to those who have borne the burden and heat of the day, amid much of ridicule and of scorn, who have long shown the courage of their opinions, and avowed them, some men of culture and ability with caste and position to lose, all persons of open unprejudiced mind, though "not many wise after the flesh, not many learned" are called to inaugurate a new dispensation.

In all seriousness I say it—scorn not the plank that is being laid, the bridge that is being built, from one extreme position to the other, for thereon perchance may Scepticism and Credulity meet, and from their intercourse be born some nobler and higher thing than either.*

THE WALWORTH SOCIETY OF SPIRITUALISTS has formed a small committee for the purpose of assisting Mr. J. C. Robson. Friends wishing to contribute to the fund may send their donations to our care. We understand Mr. Robson will regularly officiate at the weekly circle of this society.

UNDER the heading "What is it?" Vanity Fair of November 21st publishes a long article from a correspondent detailing his experiences at a materialisation séance at which the form was evolved from the medium's side in sight of the sitters. Although no name is mentioned, we easily perceive from the description that Mr. Eglington was the medium in question.

A MONUMENT has been erected in memory of Alphonse Cahagnet, by many of his friends, over his remains in the cemetery of Argenteuil, near Paris. Some of our readers will have a cordial remembrance of M. Cahagnet, a translation of whose "Revelations of a Life to Come," through a magnetic somnambule, was published in London before the advent of Modern Spiritualism in America.

A PSYCHICAL society, so-called, has been organised in St. Louis, with the Rev. Mr. Snyder, the Unitarian preacher, as President. If the selection of this reverend gentleman is an indication of the bias of the organisation, it were better to name it the Society for the Promotion of Psychical Farce, unless we are incorrectly informed as to Mr. Snyder's attitude towards the spirit hypothesis.—Religio-Philosophical Journal.

THE current number of The Month—a Catholic magazine—contains a charming story, by Dr. Anna Kingsford, entitled "A Village of Seers," for informing them of which we feel sure our readers will thank us. It is an account which reads as if historical—so vivid and natural is the narrative—of an Alpine community, which, for some deed of charity, had been endowed with the gift of clairvoyance, a gift in which their dogs participated, but the exercise of which was restricted to the eve of Christmas Day. And the story turns upon the preservation and final rescue, by means of this faculty, of a child lost in the mountains, after all other means have been exhausted, the lucidity of the dogs playing an essential part in the drama. Not the least notable circumstance is the appearance in a Catholic periodical of a tale in which animals are recognised as possessed of souls, as must be the case if they are clairvoyant, and clairvoyance is a psychic faculty. But we may be mistaken as to Catholic doctrine on this point.

DR. ED. VON HARTMANN has made it manifest to the German circles of science and letters that Spiritism survives after having been so often slain. This celebrated author of the "Philosophy of the Unconscious" has issued a pamphlet in which he devotes 118 pages to showing how utterly mistaken are a great many simple, credulous people—Crookes and others, for instance, in England, and Zollner and others in Germany,—and how foolish it is of them to regard ultra-mundane intelligences as their cause, and which—by the light of his "Philosophy of the Unconscious"—he easily traces to "magnetism, somnambulism, somnambulant consciousness, middle-brain function, and a faculty in 'mediums' to communicate hallucinations to sensitive individuals," within whose craniums, Dr. von Hartmann says, spirits only exist. This judgment he delivers after reading certain books on the question, without having had "an opportunity"—why not, Dr. von Hartmann?—"of making personal investigation." It is not usual, however, for men of science to pronounce upon questions of serious import without a more complete study of the facts than he confesses to have made: this surprises us the more, as Dr. von Hartmann is known to be serious among the serious.—Revue Spirite.

* I read with interest Mr. Garney's remark, and quotation in the last "LIGHT," which went to prove that we are not so much at variance perhaps as I had assumed. I noted also Mr. Myers' observation in his recent article that, though he prefers the new physiological methods, he has himself arrived by them at much the same old conclusions as to personality; though this one would certainly not have inferred from what he has written.

THE EXPERIMENTAL RESEARCH SECTION

OF THE

LONDON SPIRITUALIST ALLIANCE

Has been established with the object primarily of—

Promoting systematic research by experts, including (a) the encouragement of exact methods of inquiry; (b) the accurate recording of observed facts; (c) the regulation of admission to and the graduation of circles, so as to afford a complete and progressive course of investigation and instruction; (d) the more careful treatment of mediums, and (e) the publication in the Spiritualist Press of carefully tabulated results.

And secondarily of—

Assisting inquiry into Spiritualism either by (a) directing inquirers, where necessary, in a preliminary course of reading; (b) advising in the formation of private family circles; or (c) where practicable furnishing introductions to already organised circles.

Members of the London Spiritualist Alliance are eligible for election to the Experimental Research Section. The minimum subscription to this section is £1 ls. per annum, payable in January for the current year, but it is hoped that persons interested in the extension of research will contribute to a special fund for that purpose.

The members of the Research Section are divided into four grades, viz. :—

1. CIRCLES OF EXPERTS,
2. ELEMENTARY CIRCLES OF INVESTIGATORS,
3. INQUIRERS,

all under the direction of

4. A CENTRAL COMMITTEE OF CONTROL.

Circles of Experts will study, at their own discretion and opportunity, special groups of phenomena. They will especially direct attention to the means of securing the best conditions of observation. Their experiments will be such as could not safely be made in a less harmonious circle, or by less experienced persons. They will as experiment as to throw light on perplexing problems, and generally to add to our now scanty store of knowledge as to the methods employed by the invisible operators, the results of whose action we are all more or less acquainted with, but of whose methods of operation we know almost nothing.

Inquirers into Spiritualism, upon becoming members of the Research Section, will, if desired, be introduced to some Expert who will give the necessary advice and guidance; will direct their reading, if required; will give help in difficulty, and generally act as Mentor and sponsor to them, until, in due time, they become fit to take their place in an elementary Circle of Investigators. As circumstances allow, inquirers will be drafted into such a circle, or if it be preferred they will be advised and directed in the formation of a private circle.

GENERAL RULES.

All groups of circles of whatever degree are subject absolutely to the direction and governance of a Central Committee of Control. The names of all who desire to take part in these circles will be submitted to that Committee, and the election will be by ballot. Great care will be exercised in the selection of suitable persons, and their arrangement in circles so composed as to secure the utmost possible harmony. These circles will meet, each at its own convenience, in private houses for the most part, and their proceedings will be strictly private. They will be conducted by an Expert Director chosen by the members and approved by the Central Committee of Control. Accurate minutes of all proceedings will be kept by a Recorder; and these minutes, verified at the opening of each meeting, will be submitted at stated intervals to the Committee of Control, who alone will decide as to their publication. No publication will be permissible without the sanction of the Committee; and from its decision there will be no appeal. Each member of the various circles will pledge himself to keep all proceedings strictly private until authority is given for publication. The names of the persons who constitute a particular circle need be known only to themselves and to the Committee of Control.

PLEDGES REQUIRED.

Those who wish to take part in this work will be invited to pledge themselves

1. To an ungrudging assistance, within reasonable bounds, to any fellow member who may be assigned to them for guidance.
2. To sink absolutely any private or personal feelings that may in any way be thought likely to interfere with the perfect harmony that must characterise an inquiry of this nature if success is to be attained; or that may be at variance with the spirit in which alone this investigation can be profitably undertaken.
3. To obey, and submit to the reasonable control, of the Central Committee of Control, which is charged with the administration of this plan, and to preserve a faithful reticence as to any results obtained in any circle, until the records are published by order of that Committee.

No expression of opinion as to theories which may be held to account for observed facts, or acceptance of any special form of belief, is sought from any member. The Central Committee of Control, however, regards psychical facts from a Spiritualist point of view, though it is by no means bound down to any special theory, and may, indeed, receive and canvass any that may be proposed; and the Spiritualist Alliance, as its name implies, is, as a body, professedly Spiritualistic.

CENTRAL COMMITTEE OF CONTROL.

The constitution of this body, together with other details explanatory of the general scheme of work, will be found in the pamphlet entitled, "Spiritualism at Home and Abroad." Persons wishing to join the Experimental Research Section are requested, if already members of the London Spiritualist Alliance, to apply to the President, 16, Craven-street, Charing Cross, S.W., who will enter into further communication with them on the subject. If not members of the Alliance, application for such membership should first be made to the Hon. Sec. at the same address. On election, the new member of the Alliance will be eligible for admission, if approved by the Central Committee of Control, to the Experimental Research Section.

WHAT IS SAID OF PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

J. H. FICHTE, THE GERMAN PHILOSOPHER AND AUTHOR.—"Notwithstanding my age (83) and my exemption from the controversies of the day, I feel it my duty to bear testimony to the great fact of Spiritualism. No one should keep silent."

PROFESSOR DE MORGAN, PRESIDENT OF THE MATHEMATICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.—"I am perfectly convinced that I have both seen and heard, in a manner which should make unbelief impossible, things called spiritual, which cannot be taken by a rational being to be capable of explanation by imposture, coincidence, or mistake. So far I feel the ground firm under me."

DR. ROBERT CHAMBERS.—"I have for many years known that these phenomena are real, as distinguished from impostures; and it is not of yesterday that I concluded they were calculated to explain much that has been doubtful in the past; and, when fully accepted, revolutionise the whole frame of human opinion on many important matters."—Extract from a Letter to A. Russell Wallace.

PROFESSOR HARE, EMERITUS PROFESSOR OF CHEMISTRY IN THE UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA.—"Far from abating my confidence in the inferences respecting the agencies of the spirits of deceased mortals, in the manifestations of which I have given an account in my work, I have, within the last nine months" (this was written in 1858) "had more striking evidences of that agency than those given in the work in question."

PROFESSOR CHALLIS, THE LATE PLUMERIAN PROFESSOR OF ASTRONOMY AT CAMBRIDGE.—"I have been unable to resist the large amount of testimony to such facts, which has come from many independent sources, and from a vast number of witnesses. . . . In short, the testimony has been so abundant and consistent, that I feel the facts must be admitted to be such as are reported, or the possibility of certifying facts by human testimony must be given up."—Clerical Journal, June, 1862.

PROFESSOR GREGORY, F.R.S.E.—"The essential question is this, What are the proofs of the agency of departed spirits? Although I cannot say that I yet feel the sure and firm conviction on this point which I feel on some others, I am bound to say that the higher phenomena, recorded by so many truthful and honourable men, appear to me to render the spiritual hypothesis almost certain. . . . I believe that if I could myself see the higher phenomena alluded to I should be satisfied, as are all those who have had the best means of judging of the truth of the spiritual theory."

LORD BROUGHAM.—"There is but one question I would ask the author, Is the Spiritualism of this work foreign to our materialistic, manufacturing age? No; for amidst the varieties of mind which divers circumstances produce are found those who cultivate man's highest faculties; to these the author addresses himself. But even in the most cloudless skies of scepticism I see a rain-cloud, if it be no bigger than a man's hand; it is modern Spiritualism."—Preface by Lord Brougham to "The Book of Nature," By C. O. Groom Napier, F.C.S.

THE LONDON DIALECTICAL COMMITTEE reported: "1. That sounds of a very varied character, apparently proceeding from articles of furniture, the floor and walls of the room—the vibrations accompanying which sounds are often distinctly perceptible to the touch—occur, without being produced by muscular action or mechanical contrivance. 2. That movements of heavy bodies take place without mechanical contrivance, of any kind, or adequate exertion of muscular force by those present, and frequently without contact or connection with any person. 3. That these sounds and movements often occur at the time and in the manner asked for by persons present, and, by means of a simple code of signals, answer questions and spell out coherent communications."

PROFESSOR BARRETT, F.R.S.E.—"I know and rejoice in the blessing Spiritualism has been to my own faith, and to that of several dear friends of mine. Moreover, I cordially recognise the fact that in bereavement and deep distress numbers have been cheered and consoled by the hope that Spiritualism has set before them. . . . So far from Materialism being true, I do not believe a single person has ever yet lived on this earth who has truly and heartily desired to know if an intelligent and personal existence be possible without our present bodily organism, and has steadily set himself to solve this supreme question with all the help he can gain from every source,—I say I do not believe any such earnest seeker after truth has ever failed to obtain a clear and definite answer in the affirmative."

CAMILLE FLAMMARION, THE FRENCH ASTRONOMER, AND MEMBER OF THE ACADEMIE FRANCAISE.—"I do not hesitate to affirm my conviction, based on personal examination of the subject, that any scientific man who declares the phenomena denominated 'magnetic,' 'somnambule,' 'mediumic,' and others not yet explained by science to be 'impossible,' is one who speaks without knowing what he is talking about; and also any man accustomed, by his professional avocations, to scientific observation—provided that his mind be not biased by pre-conceived opinions, nor his mental vision blinded by that opposite kind of illusion, unhappily too common in the learned world, which consists in imagining that the laws of Nature are already known to us, and that everything which appears to overstep the limit of our present formulas is impossible—may acquire a radical and absolute certainty of the reality of the facts alluded to."

CROMWELL F. VARLEY, F.R.S.—"Twenty-five years ago I was a hard-headed unbeliever. . . . Spiritual phenomena, however, suddenly and quite unexpectedly, were soon after developed in my own family. . . . This led me to inquire and to try numerous experiments in such a way as to preclude, as much as circumstances would permit, the possibility of trickery and self-deception. . . . He then details various phases of the phenomena which had come within the range of his personal experience, and continues: "Other and numerous phenomena have occurred, proving the existence (a) of forces unknown to science; (b) the power of instantly reading my thoughts; (c) the presence of some intelligence or intelligences controlling those powers. . . . That the phenomena occur there is overwhelming evidence, and it is too late now to deny their existence."

ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, F.R.S.—"My position, therefore, is that the phenomena of Spiritualism in their entirety do not require further confirmation. They are proved, quite as well as any facts are proved in other sciences, and it is not denial or quibbling that can disprove any of them, but only fresh facts and accurate deductions from those facts. When the opponents of Spiritualism can give a record of their researches approaching in duration and completeness to those of its advocates; and when they can discover and show in detail, either how the phenomena are produced or how the many sane and able men here referred to have been deluded into a coincident belief that they have witnessed them; and when they can prove the correctness of their theory by producing a like belief in a body of equally sane and able untheorists—then, and not till then, will it be necessary for Spiritualists to produce fresh confirmation of facts which are, and always have been, sufficiently real and indisputable to satisfy any honest and persevering inquirer."—Miracles and Modern Spiritualism.

DR. LOCKHART ROBERTSON.—"The writer" (i.e., Dr. L. Robertson) "can now no more doubt the physical manifestations of so-called Spiritualism than he would any other fact, as, for example, the fall of the apple to the ground, of which his senses informed him. As stated above, there was no place or chance of any legerdemain, or fraud, in these physical manifestations. He is aware, even from recent experience, of the impossibility of convincing anyone, by a mere narrative of events apparently so out of harmony with all our knowledge of the laws which govern the physical world, and he places these facts on record rather as an act of justice due to those whose similar statements he had elsewhere doubted and denied, than with either the desire or hope of convincing others. Yet he cannot doubt the ultimate recognition of facts of the truth of which he is so thoroughly convinced. Admit these physical manifestations, and a strange and wide world of research is opened to our inquiry. This field is new to the materialist mind of the last two centuries, which even in the writings of divines of the English Church, doubts and denies all spiritual manifestations and agencies, be they good or evil."—From a letter by Dr. Lockhart Robertson, published in the Dialectical Society's Report on Spiritualism, p. 24.

NASSAU WILLIAM SENIOR.—"No one can doubt that phenomena like these (Phrenology, Homoeopathy, and Mesmerism) deserve to be observed, recorded, and arranged; and whether we call by the name of mesmerism, or by any other name, the science which proposes to do this, is a mere question of nomenclature. Among those who profess this, science there may be careless observers, prejudiced recorders, and rash systematisers; their errors and defects may impede the progress of knowledge, but they will not stop it. And we have no doubt that, before the end of this century, the wonders which perplex almost equally those who accept and those who reject modern mesmerism will be distributed into defined classes, and found subject to ascertained laws—in other words, will become the subjects of a science." These views will prepare us for the following statement, made in the Spiritual Magazine, 1864, p. 336: "We have only to add, as a further tribute to the attainments and honours of Mr. Senior, that he was by long inquiry and experience a firm believer in spiritual power and manifestations. Mr. Home was his frequent guest, and Mr. Senior made no secret of his belief among his friends. He it was who recommended the publication of Mr. Home's recent work by Messrs. Longmans, and he authorised the publication, under initials, of one of the striking incidents there given, which happened to a near and dear member of his family."

WHAT CONJURERS SAY ABOUT PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

Mediums, who are the instruments of an external agency, have, more than once, been confronted with conjurers who deceive by sleight of hand; and in the same manner that no man of science who has thoroughly and fairly investigated the phenomena has failed to become convinced of their reality, so no conjurer who has been confronted with the same facts has been able to explain their occurrence by prestidigitation. Houdin, Jacobs, Bellachini, Hermann, Kellar, and others have already confessed their powerlessness to produce under the same conditions what occurs without human intervention in the presence of a medium.

Testimony of Robert Houdin.

The Marquis Endes de Mirville published during the lifetime of Houdin two letters from the latter, in his "Mémoire adressé à MM. les membres de l'Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques, sur un grand nombre de phénomènes merveilleux intéressant également la Religion, la Science, et les hommes du Monde," in which the conjurer confesses his inability to explain the phenomena he witnessed in the presence of Alexis, the clairvoyant. A circumstantial account is given of M. de Mirville's visit to Houdin for the purpose of engaging him in this investigation, of the latter's confidence in his own ability to detect the trick, and of what took place at the séance, the conditions of which were entirely under Houdin's control. This account extends over twelve pages, and its accuracy is confirmed by Houdin in the first of the documents now translated:—

"Although very far from accepting the eulogies which M. ——— is good enough to bestow upon me, and especially insisting that I am not at all committed to opinions, either in favour of magnetism or against it, I can, nevertheless, refrain from declaring that the facts above reported are entirely correct (sont de la plus complète exactitude), and that, the more I reflect upon them, the more impossible I find it to rank them among those which belong to my art and profession.

4th May, 1847. ROBERT HOUDIN."

A fortnight later, M. de Mirville received another letter, in which the following, referring to another séance, occurs:—

"I have, therefore, returned from this séance as astonished as it is possible to be, and persuaded that it is utterly impossible that chance or skill could ever produce effects so wonderful (tout à fait impossible que le hasard ou l'adresse puisse jamais produire des effets aussi merveilleux).—I am, monsieur, &c.,

May 16th, 1847. (Signed) ROBERT HOUDIN."

Testimony of Harry Kellar.

Harry Kellar, a distinguished professor of legerdemain, investigated the slate-writing phenomena which occurred in the presence of Mr. Eglinton, at Calcutta, in January, 1882, and on the 25th of that month he addressed a letter to the editor of the Indian Daily News, in which he said:—

"In your issue of the 13th January I stated that I should be glad of an opportunity of participating in a séance with a view of giving an unbiased opinion as to whether, in my capacity of a professional prestidigitator, I could give a natural explanation of effects said to be produced by spiritual aid.

"I am indebted to the courtesy of Mr. Eglinton, the Spiritualistic medium now in Calcutta, and of his host, Mr. J. Meugens, for affording me the opportunity I craved.

"It is needless to say I went as a sceptic, but I must own that I have come away utterly unable to explain, by any natural means, the phenomena that I witnessed on Tuesday evening. I will give a brief description of what took place."

After describing several successful experiments, Mr. Kellar proceeds:—

"In respect to the above manifestations, I can only say that I do not expect my account of them to gain general credence. Forty-eight hours before I should not have believed anyone who described such manifestations under similar circumstances. I still remain a sceptic as regards Spiritualism, but I repeat my inability to explain or account for what must have been an intelligent force that produced the writing on the slate, which, if my senses are to be relied on, was in no way the result of trickery or sleight of hand."

On the 30th of the same month Mr. Kellar addressed another letter to the Indian Daily News, reporting some experiences of another kind with Mr. Eglinton, and regarding which he said:—

"In conclusion, let me state that after a most stringent trial and strict scrutiny of these wonderful experiences I can arrive at no other conclusion than that there was no trace of trickery in any form; nor was there in the room any mechanism or machinery by which could be produced the phenomena which had taken place. The ordinary mode by which Musketyns and other conjurers imitate levitation or the floating test could not possibly be done in the room in which we were assembled."

The Testimony of Professor Jacobs.

Professor Jacobs, writing to the editor of Licht, sehr Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—

"Spite of the assertions, more or less trustworthy, of the French and English journalists, and spite of the foolish jealousies of ignorant conjurers, I feel it my duty to show up the bad faith of one party and the chicanery of the other. All that has been said or done adverse to these American mediums is absolutely trustworthy. If we would rightly judge of a thing we must understand it, and neither the journalists nor the conjurers possessed the most elementary knowledge of the science that governs these phenomena. As a prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the mediumistic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect.

"Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. If (as I have every reason to hope) the physical studies, to which I am applying myself at this time, succeed, I shall be able to establish clearly, and that by public demonstration, the immense line of demarcation which separates mediumistic phenomena from conjuring proper, and then equivocation will be no longer possible, and persons will have to yield to evidence, or deny through predetermination to deny.

"Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also the individuality of the spirit in 'spiritual manifestation.' I authorise you, dear sir, to insert this letter in your next number, if agreeable to you, &c., &c."

Testimony of Samuel Bellachini.

Samuel Bellachini, Court Conjurer at Berlin, made the following declaration in December, 1877:—

"I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Berne; Butlerof, in St. Petersburg, to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the 'How' of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a notary and witnesses.

"Berlin, December 6th, 1877. (Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI."

ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By "M.A. (Oxon.)."

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct séances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experiences in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two, of negative, passive temperament, and preferably of the female sex, the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each sitter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Scepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitter spirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear.

Patience is essential, and it may be necessary to meet ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such a trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful séance.

The first indications of success usually are a cold breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twitchings of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not aiding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over, but not in contact with, it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if the attempt to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might disconcert an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will check noisy manifestations.

Lastly. Try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your reason. Do not enter into a very solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well-grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.

PHASES OF MATERIALIZATION.

IN THE

OBJECTIVE PHENOMENA OF SPIRITUALISM.

IV.—TESTS SPECIALLY APPLIED.

There is hardly any medium who is, or has been before the public who has not been subjected to a series of more or less intelligent tests, having for their object the proof that the medium and form are not identical; in other words, that a genuine materialization has taken place. Many of these tests were absolutely conclusive: some, such as the tying of the medium behind a curtain or within a cabinet, do not impress me of themselves, though they have their value when taken in connection with other circumstances. In some cases, the series of tests imposed extended over years, and no citation, such as space permits me to make, would do any sort of justice to the results arrived at. Such a case is that of Miss Florence Cook (Mrs. Corner). The record of the carefully applied tests in her case, contained in the pages of The Spiritualist, must be read consecutively in order to estimate its value as a piece of connected evidence. The still more stringent and conclusive tests applied by Mr. Crookes, F.R.S., are not public property; and I can only say, therefore, that no more conclusive evidence ever attested a fact than did that elicited by Mr. Crookes, in his own house, and under conditions most favourable for observation, the fact of materialization. It would be unfair to the subject which I am endeavouring to present with specimens of its best proof, were I altogether to omit some records of Miss Florence Cook's remarkable mediumship; but I repeat that I can give no complete idea of the wealth of evidence already before the public by any quotations that space will permit me to make. I can but give some well-known records as specimens of countless others, lest I should even seem to ignore what is of such value.

In the *Spiritual Magazine Mr. Benjamin Coleman, an observer of large experience, and much shrewd sagacity, describes a séance held at the house of Mr. Luxmore, on November 18th, 1873. The material points he thus narrates:—

"Her hands were first tied together with a piece of tape, the ends of which were sewn and sealed, and then the tape was passed round her waist and tightly knotted and sewn and sealed again. The tape was then passed through a staple in the floor, having a slack of about a foot, and there knotted again, which restrained Miss Cook from standing up to her full height, and then the tape was brought into the room nearly up to our feet. Mrs. Honeywood entered the cabinet—a room separated by folding doors from that in which the observers sat—the instant Katie disappeared, and there she saw Miss Cook asleep, leaning over nearly to the floor, the ties on her hands and waist unchanged. Miss Cook, dressed in black, wearing stockings and spring boots, was seen an instant after Katie, who was clothed in pure white garments, and whose feet were naked." Mr. Coleman adds that Katie presented the exact features of Miss Cook.

The late Prince Emile de Sayn Wittgenstein, in the course of a letter* bearing strong testimony to Miss Florence Cook's powers as a medium, thus gives reason for maintaining the separate individuality of Katie King in spite of her frequently striking resemblance to Miss Cook.

"Katie resembles Miss Cook by the law of the perisprit keeping, when disengaged, the impression of the material form to which it belongs. The two are positively distinct personalities not to be mistaken, and only bearing between them a sort of strong family likeness. One of the most striking proofs of Katie's immateriality appears to me in her way of moving. She did not walk; she did not even glide; she seemed to be there at once without my knowing how she came. The touch of her hand also is not that of a material one. It feels more like velvet than skin, and produces the impression of an empty glove filled with air. But the most irrefutable proof of Katie and Miss Cook being two separate individuals was given to me at the end of a séance at Hackney (the residence of Miss Cook). Katie had not disappeared for longer than forty seconds at most when we opened the curtains and found Miss Cook in the act of awaking. It would have been quite impossible for her to change her gown, put on her boots, dress her hair, in so short a time; and the space itself in which she sat is too narrow to admit the possibility of moving about and dressing in it, had even the time been sufficient."

About the end of the month of February, 1874, ("three weeks ago,") Mr. Varley, F.R.S., at a séance held at the house of Mr. Luxmore, Mr. Crookes, F.R.S., and other observers present, tested Miss Florence Cook by a series of electric experiments. A minutely detailed account contains records taken at short intervals throughout the séance.

"Miss Cook was placed in an arm-chair in the room which was subsequently to serve as a darkened cabinet. Two sovereigns, to which platinum wires had been soldered, attached one to each of her arms a little above her wrists, by means of elastic rings. Between the sovereigns and the skin three layers of thick white blotting paper, moistened with solution of nitrate of ammonia, were placed. The platinum wires were attached to her arms and led up to her shoulders, so as to allow of the free movement of her limbs. To each platinum wire was attached a thin, cotton-covered copper wire which led into the light room where the sitters were located. . . . Prior to the medium being entranced, she was requested to move her hands about, which by varying the amount of metallic surface in actual contact with the paper and skin, produced deflections of from fifteen to thirty divisions of the galvanometer, and sometimes more; consequently, if during the séance she moved her hands at all, the fact was instantly rendered visible by the galvanometer. In fact, Miss Cook took the place of a telegraph cable under electric test. . . . The current was not interrupted an instant during the whole séance. Had the circuit been broken for only one-tenth of a second the galvanometer would have moved over 200 divisions. Katie came out into the room. Katie was much like the medium. . . . Towards the close of the séance the room was darkened, and Katie allowed me to approach her. She then let me grasp her hand; it was a long one, very cold and clammy. A minute or two afterwards Katie told me to go into the dark chamber to detrance Miss Cook. I found her in a deep trance, huddled together in her easy chair, her head lying upon her left shoulder, her right hand hanging down. Her hand was small, warm, and dry, and not long, cold, and clammy like Katie's. In the course of two or three minutes she came out of the trance. . . . The sovereigns, blotting-paper, and wires were exactly as I had left them, viz., attached to her arms by pieces of elastic."

In one of his records* of facts observed by himself in his own house, and in the midst of his own family, Mr. Crookes thus writes:—

"On March 12th, during a séance in my house, after Katie had been walking amongst us and talking for some time, she retreated behind the curtain which separated my laboratory, where the company was sitting, from my library, which did duty as a cabinet. In a minute she came to the curtain and called me to her, saying, 'Come into the room and lift my medium's head up, she has slipped down.' Katie was then standing before me clothed in her usual white robes and turban head-dress. I immediately walked into the library up to Miss Cook, Katie stepping aside to allow me to pass. I found Miss Cook had slipped partially off the sofa, and her head was hanging in a very awkward position. I lifted her on to the sofa, and in so doing had satisfactory evidence, in spite of the darkness, that Miss Cook was not attired in the Katie costume, but had on her ordinary black velvet dress, and was in a deep trance. Not more than three seconds elapsed between my seeing the white-robed Katie standing before me and my raising Miss Cook on to the sofa from the position into which she had fallen. On returning to my post of observation by the curtain, Katie appeared again and said she thought she should be able to show herself and her medium to me at the same time. The gas was then turned out, and she asked for my phosphorus lamp. After exhibiting herself by it for some seconds, she handed it back to me saying, 'Now come in and see my medium.' I closely followed her into the library, and by the light of my lamp saw Miss Cook lying on the sofa just as I had left her. I looked round for Katie but she had disappeared. I called her, but there was no answer."

"I pass on to a séance held last night [March 29th, 1874] at Hackney. Katie never appeared to greater perfection, and for nearly two hours she walked about the room conversing familiarly. On several occasions she took my arm when walking. . . . I asked permission to clasp her in my arms. . . . Permission was given. She appeared to be as material a being as Miss Cook herself. But the sequel shows how wrong it is for an experimentalist, however accurate his observations may be, to venture to draw an important conclusion from an insufficient amount of evidence."

"Katie now said she thought she should be able this time, to show herself and Miss Cook together. I went cautiously with my phosphorus lamp into the room, it being dark, and felt about for Miss Cook. I found her crouching on the floor. Kneeling down, I let air into the lamp, and by its light I saw the young lady dressed in black velvet, as she had been in the early part of the evening, and to all appearances perfectly senseless. She did not move when I took her hand and held the light close to her face, but continued quietly breathing. Raising the lamp, I looked round and saw Katie standing close behind Miss Cook. She was robed in flowing white drapery, as we had seen her previously during the séance. Holding one of Miss Cook's hands in mine and still kneeling, I passed the lamp up and down so as to illuminate Katie's whole figure, and satisfy myself thoroughly that I was really looking at the veritable Katie whom I had clasped in my arms a few minutes before, and not at the phantom of a disordered brain. She did not speak, but moved her head and smiled in recognition. Three separate times did I carefully examine Miss Cook crouching before me, to be sure that the hand I held was that of a living woman, and three separate times did I turn the lamp to Katie and examine her with steadfast scrutiny, until I had no doubt whatever of her objective reality."

"At last Miss Cook moved slightly, and Katie instantly motioned me to go away. I went to another part of the cabinet and then ceased to see Katie, but did not leave the room till Miss Cook woke up and two of the visitors came in with a light."

* Spiritualist, April 3rd, 1874.

In answer to a letter of inquiry addressed to him by Mr. Cholmondeley-Pennell, Mr. Crookes adds the following.*

"At the time of the occurrence I felt its importance too much to neglect any test which I thought would be likely to add to its completeness. As I held one of Miss Cook's hands all the time, and knelt by her, held the light close to her face, and watched her breathing, I have abundant reason to know that I was not deceived by a lay figure or by a bundle of clothes. As regards the identity of Katie, I have the same positive conviction. Height, figure, features, complexion, dress, and pleasant smile of recognition, were all the same as I have seen there dozens of times; and as I have repeatedly stood for many minutes within a few inches of her face, in a good light, Katie's appearance is to me as familiar as is that of Miss Cook herself."

Later† Mr. Crookes describes an occurrence at some recent séances in his house. He states that two mediums—Miss Showers and Miss F. Cook—being present, two materialised forms—"Katie" and "Florence"—walked about in his laboratory "with their arms entwined school-girl fashion, and in a strong light." He further adds: "Katie has also materialised and spoken when I have been in the cabinet with Miss F. Cook, holding her hand; but, it being dark, I could see nothing except here and there lights, one of which settled on my coat-sleeve."

Mr. Crookes succeeded in photographing the materialised form of Katie by electric light. During the later séances,‡ held at his house, he had ample opportunity of comparing the medium with the materialised spirit-form, and of noting the many points of difference between them in spite of a superficial resemblance which was more manifest at some times than at others. Moreover, he is able to say that "it was a common thing for the seven or eight of us [comprising his home circle] to see Miss Cook and Katie at the same time under the full blaze of the electric light." One evening he had opportunity of timing Katie's pulse. "It beat steadily at seventy-five, whilst Miss Cook's pulse, a little after, was going at the usual rate of ninety."§

Not needlessly to multiply testimony, I will only add|| that Florence Marryat records a piece of perfectly conclusive evidence. At a séance, when Katie said farewell to her friends, her power of manifesting her presence through Miss F. Cook's mediumship being about to cease, Florence Marryat states that she "saw and touched the warm, breathing form of the medium, and at the same time saw, and touched, and felt Katie standing by."

Testimony such as this of Mr. Crookes is not to be put aside, unless published testimony, solemnly given, is to be disregarded altogether. It will not be pretended that it is not conclusive, except by those curiously-constituted minds to whom no proof suffices to establish an unwelcome truth.

If it be permitted to quote from another source in corroboration of what has already been adduced, I will refer to a record which bears the well-known name of Mr. C. C. Massey.¶ Together with a friend (who "concurs with him in his account and in entire satisfaction with the result"), Mr. Massey had a séance with Miss F. Cook at the rooms of the Dalston Association of Inquirers into Spiritualism, on September 22nd, 1878. The medium sat in a back room, and a curtain divided it from the front room, where the sitters were placed one on each side of the curtain. The medium had been elaborately tied round the waist with tape, which was sealed and wound round the chair and carried to some distance.

"We conversed a short time with the medium * * * This was followed by a hand and arm * * * Next the curtain was drawn away on one side and the other, showing at each side successively a full-length figure, enveloped in ample masses of white drapery, and which spoke to us (the voice being Marie's) from the places at which it appeared, moved, and gave undoubted evidence that it was not a 'dummy.' On re-entering the room we found the medium seated on the chair in the same position as before * * * Knots and seals were intact. * * * Nothing had been tampered with."

It is not in my power to add to the evidence respecting Miss Florence Cook's mediumship. It has been subjected at various times to the most stringent tests. And if, in later years, doubt has been cast on its genuineness in a particular case, I can only say that that doubt was not substantiated by evidence sufficient to establish the case that was sought to be made out. Much less do such rough and ready methods of investigation invalidate the careful and cautious conclusions arrived at by Mr. Crookes after prolonged and patient observation.

A CHILD'S STRANGE MALADY.

We take the following narrative of a trance, headed as above, from the Literary World of November 27th, which the editor says a New York journal has received from a correspondent at Scranton, Pennsylvania.

"Rebecca, the fourteen-year-old daughter of David McDonald, a foreman in the moulding department of the Dickson Manufacturing Company's works, is subject to fits of trance of strange interest, some of them lasting for weeks at a time. A short time ago, on regaining consciousness after an unusually protracted spell of this sort, the girl wrote on a slate that she had been in the celestial regions, and that it was impossible to describe their glories. After another trance, she seemed greatly perturbed, and wrote that she had seen the infernal regions and their occupants. Prior to her present trouble Rebecca was an unusually bright and attractive child. One evening, about a year ago, she visited a merry-go-round, where a number of other children were playing and laughing. She started for home at nine o'clock. A short distance from the house she was accosted by two men who followed her to the door. The child's screams brought her mother to the scene, and the men ran off, but Rebecca was greatly frightened and suffered a terrible shock. Soon after this three of Mr. McDonald's other children were taken sick. Rebecca devoted much attention to them, and one evening, while ministering to their comfort, and putting things to rights in order to be in time for school, she fell downstairs and injured her spine. The injury was followed by sickness and decline, and the parents, thinking a change of air might benefit her, took her to the residence of her aunt, Mrs. Warburton, who lives in the Hyde Park section of the city. Three months ago Mrs. Warburton took Rebecca out for a walk. When only a short distance from the house the girl screamed, and fell. Her limbs became rigid, her eyes assumed a fixed stare, and she was unable to speak. She was carried home, and remained in this condition for eight days. During this time she could not move her lips or tongue, but she hummed numerous tunes. For several days she took no food. As soon as she became conscious she foamed at the mouth and snapped at everybody who approached her. Then came a period of calm. Her eyes remained closed, and her efforts to articulate were painful in the extreme. She understood every word that was spoken in the room and wrote on a slate replies to such questions as were asked her. Between that time and the 4th of July Rebecca had three singular spells. Then she appeared to get well again, was taken out riding, and seemed to be in a good way of recovery. About the middle of July she became unconscious again at the Warburton residence, resumed the humming of well-known airs, and kept this up for a long time. The doctor thrust a darning needle into her rigid limbs, but she did not seem to feel it, and continued the humming as if nothing had occurred to give her pain. Two weeks ago she became conscious, and startled all the neighbours with her screams. Then she became tranquil. She remembered nothing of the trance. A week ago last Saturday Rebecca had another trance, from which she has not yet recovered. A reporter visited the house to-day, and saw the afflicted girl. She shook hands with all who approached her bedside, and her efforts to speak were exceedingly touching. While the reporter was in the room she began humming, and kept it up for half an hour. Her closed eyes quivered, but there was no movement of the other features or limbs. The case excites the most profound pity for the little sufferer."

CORRESPONDENCE.

[It is preferable that correspondents should append their names and addresses to communications. In any case, however, these must be supplied to the Editor as a guarantee of good faith.]

Divination by Numbers. To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I feel personally obliged to your correspondent "W. P." for supporting my experience on this subject by the communication of his own. I do not, however, think the title of his letter, "Numbers as a means of Spirit Telegraphy," quite appropriate to the instance he gives, because the giving out the number by the conciierge at the Musée Plantin was, as in so many of my own cases, a fact which, according to the temporal order of things, could not be directly influenced by spirit interference, unless the conciierge was made to give a number out of the regular succession of the tickets handed to visitors as they entered in exchange for their umbrellas. Otherwise it was the apparent coincidence, that "W. P." should arrive just at the turn for No. 107, that makes the case so difficult, as well for Spiritualists as for anyone else. It is this circumstance that made me for years withhold my own similar facts from even the Spiritualistic public. Three years ago I obtained responses in this way on so many occasions as to convince me that I was in the presence of one of the deepest of metaphysical mysteries, one for which even the section of the public most advanced in the recognition of mysteries was hardly prepared. Let me remark, however, that like all true experience of nature this particular mystery is very ancient—some of the systems of augury presenting the same difficulty that the event is apparently determined by an infinite regressive series of physical antecedents and conditions.

The following case of a recent response is less mysterious in this respect, but is worth mention as the subject has been broached.

One day, about a fortnight ago, I was thinking of the physical conditions which might, in my own case, prevent that direct communication with the spiritual world which I have long exceedingly desired. It occurred to me (as often before) that my habit of rather excessive smoking might produce a state of brain adverse to this possibility.* It occurred to me to try for indirect confirmation of this surmise by the numerical method. I ascertained the value of the words "smoking bad," which is 95. Then I meant to take a book, open it, and place my finger on a line without looking. If the line contained a word of the value 95, I should have my affirmative answer. But by one of those trivial perplexities which happen to all of us occasionally, I could not at first decide on a book, though many were nearly within reach of my hand as I sat. Though I had no reason for preferring any, I rejected, as if instinctively, two or three that lay close by. Then Abbot's translation of Kant's "Theory of Ethics" occurred to me, with an immediate and quite unaccountable sense of satisfaction. I rose to get it from the shelf, opened it at once at random, and dropped my finger about the middle of the page (p. 289, 3rd edition). I found it had fallen on two lines. On the upper one, the first word to the left of my finger, was the word "wholly"—95. On the lower one, partly under my finger, was the word "elevating," also—95! I then took the trouble to count the numerical value of every word (not evidently too short) in the thirty-three lines of the page. Only one other had the value 95. Now, I touched two lines; and supposing (as the fact was) the three right words on the page to be on different lines, the chance of any two given lines containing at least one of the words was $\frac{2}{33}$, or the odds were less than five to one against the event. But the chance of the "double event" obtained, that is, that the two lines touched should contain two of the three words, was only $\frac{1}{165}$ (since $\frac{2 \times 2}{33 \times 33} = \frac{4}{1089} = \frac{1}{272.25}$, and $\frac{2}{33} = \frac{1}{16.5}$). And the odds against my finger falling on one of the three right words in the page, and in immediate proximity to another, were of course enormously greater.

Any one who supposes that the alphabetical valuation is a fanciful novelty of "W. P." and myself may be referred to the "Story of the Báb," in the current Contemporary Review. Moreover, the fact that the Hebrew letters are proper numerals, has led to a whole system of mystical interpretation of the Bible by

* When I was at the Eddy Homestead, ten years ago, we were one evening sitting round the stove talking, and most of us, myself included, smoking, when Horatio was "controlled," and in the course of his remarks, turned to me abruptly, saying (or the "spirit" saying through him): "You wish to be a medium; do not smoke." (If I remember rightly, Horatio was himself a smoker.)

this means; and it is said that verses of the most different verbal composition, if expressive of the same leading principle or idea, are found to have the same numerical value. (See a work by Dr. Mahan, an American author, on this subject—I cannot recall the title of the work—and also Mr. Grattan Guinness's "Approaching End of the Age.")

"Spiritism versus Other Theories."

SIR,—The powerful series of articles by Mr. Roden Noel under the above heading cannot fail to command the serious attention of all who may be concerned to defend the positions he attacks. The humble office of translator does not impose the obligation of championing an author's ideas, and much that Mr. Noel says against Hartmann involves the argument against others, who will doubtless meet it, if not in your columns, elsewhere. For myself, moreover, I would say that I should feel it rash and presumptuous to encounter this long and able essay in an off-hand reply; though, as what I have written on my own account is occasionally criticised, later on I must ask leave to occupy some of your space. Meanwhile I will only remark that I think there are points on which Mr. Noel has not quite correctly represented Hartmann's views; and further, that in exploring this new field of psychology, we should be particularly cautious how we oppose to any tentative hypothesis those à priori conceptions of personality which are in truth upon their trial.

As regards Mr. Haughton's letter in "LIGHT" on Von Hartmann, I do not feel the same difficulty. With what he says about "transferred hallucinations" I quite agree, but I must regret the tone in which he speaks of the eminent author he attacks, a tone not justified by accuracy of criticism. For it is not the fact that Hartmann "believes in the visible universe, and in nothing beyond it," nor that he "cannot at all understand how spirits can exist." Wholly unjust, also, is the charge against Hartmann that "his dearest concern is not to jeopardise his philosophical reputation in relation to these phenomena," because he will not be responsible for individual cases. His explicit, honest, and most courageous declaration in view of the whole evidence (see p. 22 of reprint) was one of my reasons for undertaking the translation. Looking at the rabid prejudice prevailing in Germany, Hartmann's recognition of the subject might well be injurious to any reputation less firmly established. To Mr. Haughton's vituperation of Hartmann and his ideas, "ignoble," "cowardly," "selfish," "low-thoughted," "jargon," &c., I must be excused from replying. But why does Mr. Haughton misdescribe even poor Slade? Slade was never a "prisoner," never a "discharged convict," was not even, in contemplation of law, a convict at all, for the quashing of the conviction at the Middlesex Sessions related back, and annulled it ab initio.

London Spiritualist Alliance.
To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—This being a favourable time for Spiritualists to become members of the London Spiritualist Alliance, I ask your permission to beg all our friends who have not yet joined us, to do so. I know from personal correspondence that there are many Spiritualists scattered over the country who not only stand aloof from our organisation, but whenever an opportunity is afforded them of contributing in any way to its aid, do so under a nom de plume. They can join our Society under such disguise if they wish it, but why such reticence is so often assumed mystifies those who have stood in the van of the movement when it was far less respectable to avow Spiritualistic beliefs than it is now. One word to country friends:—Upon subscribing to our Alliance they not only distinctly aid an organisation which is doing good and growing work, but they unlock to themselves the use of a valuable library, from which they can receive a constant supply of books (two at a time) through the post, by simply paying cost of transit.—Yours truly, MORELL THEOBALD, Hon. Sec.

A Mesmeric Institution.
To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I observe with much satisfaction an announcement by the President of the London Spiritual Alliance, that Mr. Regan has generously offered £100 towards founding an institution for the free healing of disease by "the laying on of hands."

There existed in London about thirty-five years ago a

Mesmeric Infirmary to which I occasionally lent my services as an amateur mesmeriser, but that institution collapsed for want of funds, because it was conducted on a too expensive scale, including an expensive house and a highly paid secretary.

For years I have contemplated the revival of this Infirmary, or a like institution, and I think the present time is a very fitting one for this purpose.

In order that the matter may be ventilated without delay, I have arranged that a meeting shall be held at my house on Sunday, the 13th inst., at three o'clock.

To this meeting I have invited some of the chief mesmerists now in London, and it will give me much pleasure if those who are interested in this important subject can also attend.

Form Manifestation.
To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—At the remarkable séance recorded by Mr. Morell Theobald in your last issue, a female form approached me, placed both arms around my neck, and kissed me.

The form strongly resembled one very dear to me, who passed away some years ago. The hair, plainly seen, was worn in an uncommon manner peculiar to her. Unfortunately, the lump was too distant to enable me to see the features clearly; but a voice from the cabinet called to me, saying, "That was Bessie, Mr. Hanne, did you recognise her?" the name given being correct.

One form came near me and brought with it a strong corpse-like odour, giving me a severe headache, which lasted some hours.

The manner of each form was automatic, moving as if on wheels. In two instances I saw the drapery, which seemed to impede progress, kicked out of the way; yet the movement was exactly as described by "M. A. (Oxon.)" in "Phases of Materialization." If that able writer could only answer his fifth point more fully, "What was the formative power, and who the operator?" he would, perhaps, remove a heavy load of doubt and perplexity from the minds of many earnest Spiritualists. The question often arises in my mind, Are we at the mercy of an unknown "intelligence"—a fourth dimensional being (see Zöllner's "Transcendental Physics"), or do we hold converse with our loved ones gone before?

Of one thing I am certain, viz., that the forms in question were genuine "spirit" forms, and not the creation of fancy, the possibility of fraud being in this instance utterly impossible.—I am, sir, yours, &c.,

Fern Cottage, Keogh-road, Stratford, E. G. HANNE.

An Inquirer's Difficulties.
To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I hardly know if you will deem what I am about to say as suitable for insertion in your journal, but premising first that I am the merest novice in Spiritualism, and am very desirous to become, if possible, satisfied on some points respecting it, I venture to state some of the difficulties or questions that often perplex me; and if any of your readers can kindly give me some "light" on these questions, I shall be very grateful.

It seems to me almost incredible that anyone of average intellect should doubt that the various occurrences connected with Spiritualism are facts, capable of being witnessed, tested, and proved to be such.

But in what class of occurrences should these facts be placed? In the psychological or moral? Do they belong to the region of natural (or supernatural) science, or to the region which simple and unphilosophical people speak of as the sensé, that from which emotion, will, good, and evil proceed?

If they belong to the scientific, to be tested, learned, and investigated, I can see that the world's knowledge might be so much the greater, and that fields hitherto hidden, or but dimly seen, would be opened, to prove of intense intellectual interest. Yet, if that be so, by how much shall we be the better? I presume, of course, that we all recognise that goodness is our highest, and should be our ultimate aim. It seems to me that those nations who were far ahead of the nineteenth century in occult science did not benefit morally by that advancement to any very appreciable extent, as compared with those nations who had comparatively no such knowledge but who had the ethics of Christianity as epitomised in the Bible.

A desire "to know" is natural, and under certain conditions, one of the highest means to good. Spiritualism meets that desire to communicate with the unseen, but do the communications presumably received from higher (because less material) intelligences seem at all adequate in quality, if I may use such a word, to the subject-matter of the Bible? If the entire record of all the "messages," "direct writings," "form-manifestations," and specially the "spirit utterances" in séances, were collected together, would not a large part of that record consist of matter of too trivial a nature to be called "spiritual" in the highest sense?

There are many more things I should like to ask, but must not take up more space now. I am most interested in "LIGHT," and cannot understand indifference to a subject that suggests such claims as those of Spiritualism.—I am, dear sir, yours faithfully,

IN EARNEST.

The Phenomenality of the Subject.
To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I must trouble you with one more letter under this title, which I will make as brief as possible.

I am sorry to have led "C. C. M." off the track by what I said as to the "subject-object." As he seemed to think that I admitted no subject-object, I just explained the sense in which I hold that a subject-object exists, and would exist even for a being who had no organism—the imperceptible percipient whom I was imagining. "C. C. M.'s" quite different "subject-object" I also admit as a fact, agreeing with his and Mr. Shadworth Hodgson's account of the important place, in my perception of the world as I find it, of a body which I call mine. The issue between us thus does not at all "turn on the nature of the subject-object"; for he admits my "subject-object" and its nature, and I admit his—as facts. The issue is whether—as he contends and I deny—a body or objective appearance of myself is logically necessary as a condition of percipience in general.* And the controversy has divided itself under two heads.

(1) As all the arguments by which "C. C. M." supported his view were drawn from a single branch of percipience—the percipience of an external world—I suggested that percipience of this world by no means exhausted percipience; and I put the question: How do I represent myself, or how can I be shown to need to represent myself, as a phenomenon similar to the phenomena which I encounter in another world of experience—the world of music? "C. C. M." attempts no answer to this question: I must, therefore, hold to my opinion that it admits of none. He argues with skill, and proves as he thinks, that when I contemplate external objects, I must be an object among them; what precludes him from a similar demonstration that, when I contemplate tunes, I must be a tune among them, except the inherent absurdity of the notion? His vague assumption that, when experiencing music, I am perceptible "under quite different modes of perception" from those involved in my bodily perceptibility is, in the first place, opposed to the fact that nobody ever found me so; and in the second place, is surely a mere blind. To be logical, his position must be this, and this only:—It is implied by the fact that I have perceptions of sight and touch that I am visible and tangible to others: it is similarly implied by the fact that I have perceptions of sound, that I am audible to others. That is the only "mode of perception" that could have any relevance to the argument. But in general, I would defy "C. C. M." to advance a step towards proving his point in respect of any sort of experience in which the two qualities of extension and externality are not prominent. A quite parallel case to music would be that of mere colour-percepts. How would a percipient who had seen nothing but blue sky "clothe his self-consciousness homogeneously"? I expect that it would need the propounding of the problem to make him look properly blue.

(2) But to come down to the single branch of experience which "C. C. M." takes into account—the experience of objects in space—I remarked that all that is logically necessary for local distinctions is that the objects seen shall be definitely related to a mathematical point or centre,—a point which, if it may be in a sense an object to the percipient whose perceptions of other objects involve it, could in no sense be an object to others, much less an organism. "C. C. M."

* May I correct here an unfortunate misprint which occurred in my letter of November 25th? In the fourth line of the paragraph numbered 2, the word asserting should be followed by a not.

seems not exactly to deny this; but he fastens on my further remark that to a percipient whose local existence was narrowed down to this simple point, "externality" and "spatial relations" might probably have a meaning rather different from their present one. He seems to regard this remark as a concession—since it admits that perception of the external world exactly as we know it implies something more than mere local position; which "something more," according to him, is a body. Now I need not enter into the further question as to how far the body implied would be the actual body that I know, or that science knows; for on that question "C. C. M." merely refers to Dr. Ingleby. It will be enough to remind him once more that the issue between him and me in respect of visual phenomena is whether my visible extension in space is logically implied in my percipience of visible objects as such—not whether it is implied in my percipience of exactly my present external world. The surmise that, when my local existence was reduced to a point, my visual experiences might be modified, is surely no concession to the view that visual experiences in themselves imply a local "positing" of something wholly different to the point—to wit, an extended body.—I am, Sir, yours obediently,
EDMUND GURNEY.

Miss Lottie Fowler's Mediumship.
To the Editor of "LIGHT."

DEAR SIR,—I think some of your readers may be glad of the information that Miss Lottie Fowler has settled herself at No. 16, Bury-street, W.C. (entrance in Gilbert-street), and is always to be seen between two and seven o'clock. Miss Fowler had a large clientèle before her visit to America which she would be glad to gather round her again. I had several sittings with her in past years, and always considered her one of the most remarkable clairvoyants living. I sat again with her last week and had every reason to think her powers unabated. As an adviser and director in business matters, her control is especially good, and I would trust her implicitly. As several people seem unaware of Miss Fowler's present address, I thought this note might help both her and them.—I am, dear sir, yours faithfully,

FLORENCE MARRYAT.

OUR friend M. Helleberg of Cincinnati, U.S.A., informs us that a young lady a medium for the slate writing, at one of her visits to his house, accompanied by her mother, agreed to the experiment of a wax-match being placed between the slates instead of the usual fragment of pencil. After a short time, a sound was heard, the slates were opened, the match was found burning. Our friend's wife is also a medium for the direct writing between slates. Through the slates held in her hand a spirit prescribed at considerable length for a patient suffering from a serious disorder of the kidneys. A copy of the communication so written has been forwarded to us; it is remarkable for its hygienic and prophylactic advice, and is signed "Hermann Boerhave."—Moniteur Spirite.

A CURIOUS DREAM.—Agassiz had been for two weeks trying to decipher the somewhat obscure impression of a fossil fish on the stone slab in which it was preserved. Weary and perplexed, he put his work aside at last, and tried to dismiss it from his mind. Shortly after, he waked one night persuaded that while asleep he had seen his fish with all the missing features perfectly restored. But when he tried to hold and make fast the image it escaped him. Nevertheless, he went early to the Jardin des Plantes, thinking that on looking anew at the impression he should see something which would put him on the track of his vision. In vain—the blurred record was as blank as ever. The next night he saw the fish again, but with no more satisfactory result. When he awoke it disappeared from his memory as before. Hoping that that the same experience might be repeated, on the third night he placed a pencil and paper beside his bed before going to sleep. Accordingly, towards morning the fish re-appeared in his dream, confusedly at first, but at last with such distinctness that he had no longer any doubt as to its zoological character. Still half-dreaming, in perfect darkness, he traced these characters on the sheet of paper at the bedside. In the morning he was surprised to see in his nocturnal sketch features which he thought it impossible the fossil itself should reveal. He hastened to the Jardin des Plantes, and, with his drawing as a guide, succeeded in chiseling away the surface of the stone, under which portions of the fish proved to be hidden. When wholly exposed it corresponded with his dream and his drawing, and he succeeded in classifying it with ease.—Literary World.

THE PROTECTION OF PUBLIC MEDIUMSHIP.

Three years ago, as the members of the London Spiritualist Alliance were reminded in the President's recent address, a new departure was taken in respect of the public investigation of the physical phenomena of Spiritualism. It may be well to recall the weighty words in which the "educated Spiritualists of Great Britain," i.e., those whose experience in the investigation, and trained capacity for observation fitted them to pronounce an opinion, gave utterance to a conclusion that was practically unanimous, so few were the dissentients from its terms.

"Public or promiscuous sances for physical manifestations (they wrote) have been of late years generally marked by the following characteristics:—(1) The sance has been conducted in imperfect light, or in total darkness. (2) The medium has been isolated from the circle, by being placed either in a cabinet or behind a curtain. (3) The sitters have been, either wholly or in part, unacquainted with the subject and with each other. (4) There has not infrequently been a manifest want of harmony, consequent upon differences of opinion as to the nature and value of the tests employed.

"These conditions, usually found in combination, effectually preclude careful and dispassionate investigation; open wide an avenue to fraud; suggest suspicion of its presence even where it does not exist; and in many cases, we fear, expose the medium to very injurious influences.

"Such conditions should be allowed to prevail no longer. 'Mixed' circles should be as little mixed as possible—mere wonder-seekers, and men whose moral atmosphere is known to be impure, being carefully excluded. Above all, darkness should give way to light. In the early days of Spiritualism, public dark circles were the exception, and there is no need for them now. There is abundant evidence that, with mediums of the present day, satisfactory phenomena, including even form-manifestations, can be obtained without isolation—the medium, where a cabinet is used, being placed near, but outside of it, and in full view of the sitters. But even if this were not so, it is neither wise nor honourable to expose mediums to the risks which have been shown to attend sances held under the conditions that have of late been prevalent; and it were far better that we should have no physical phenomena at all than that they should be sought under circumstances which, to say the least, inevitably conduce to suspicion.

"In view of all these considerations, believing that fraud is not of the essence of this confessedly obscure subject, but rather an accident dependent on faulty conditions of research; feeling that Spiritualists have the remedy for the evil in their own hands, and that without its conscientious application they cannot hope to maintain a fair reputation before the world; we earnestly recommend—That in all public circles held for physical phenomena, the medium be so placed, and in such light, as to be continuously under observation by each member of the circle."

"LIGHT," Vol. II., p. 522.

About the same time* Mr. Thomas Shorter addressed to the Central Association of Spiritualists some wise and well-considered advice on the question of Public Mediumship. It is needless for us to say that no man is more entitled to be heard with respect on such a subject than Mr. Shorter. His long experience, his sober habits of thought, his candid mind, and his outspoken fearlessness when necessity requires, mark him out as one eminently fitted to handle this difficult subject with discretion and thoroughness. This is Mr. Shorter's conclusion:—

"I maintain in the interests of the medium, of his health and integrity, in the interests of the investigator, in the interests of the public, in the interests of Spiritualists and Spiritualism, that this whole question of professional mediumship and of our relation to it should be seriously reconsidered. I believe if [certain changes were made which have in effect since been carried out] that Spiritualists would no longer have to hang their heads in shame, or to feel that Spiritualism was a reproach, but that it was something of which they might be honourably proud; the medium would see that I was anxious to magnify his office, for I would have him feel the responsibility of his position—that to him is committed a high and holy trust. . . . I believe that Spiritualism would be raised above that vulgar level of doubt and suspicion with which it is now beset and harassed; that we should rise into a higher and purer condition and that many of us would be able to go beyond the need of physical manifestations into the higher region of spiritual communion. . . ."

If there were some that heard these words, who at the time thought them a hard saying, events have subsequently abundantly vindicated their sagacious foresight. The Declaration promoted by the Central Association of Spiritualists was signed by some two dozen presidents or secretaries of country societies. It commended itself to such representatives of opinion, sufficiently divergent in general conclusions, but wholly agreed in this matter, as M. Aksakof, Mr. W. P. Adshead, Mr. Barkas, Miss Anna Blackwell, Mrs. Hardinge Britten, Mr. Calder, Mr. Eglinton, Mr. Farmer Mrs., and Mr. Desmond, FitzGerald, Mr. S. C. Hall, Mrs. Hallock, Mr. J. Enmore Jones, M. Leymarie, M. A. (Oxon.), Mr. C. C. Massey, Rev. W. Miall, Hon. Roden Noel, Mr. Hay Nisbet, Mr. Frank Podmore, Mr. Riko, Mr. Dawson Rogers, Dr. Speer, Mr. Morell Theobald, Mr. Tietkens, Mrs. Nosworthy, Mr. Alfred Russel Wallace, Rev. W. Whitear, and Dr. G. Wyld, not to mention many other names of consideration and weight.

We need not dwell upon the result of this action. The President of the London Spiritualist Alliance claimed that by it "a heavy blow was given to methods of investigation which should never have been sanctioned"; and that "we have practically destroyed what led to grave abuses." Experience and knowledge will affirm the justice of that claim. At the present moment Spiritualism is in a far different position to that which it occupied when Mr. Shorter so pathetically lamented its fall from its former high estate; and it occupies its present honourable place very largely in consequence of the action that we are now recalling to recollection. If we carry the minds of our readers back to those dark days, it is only that they may the better be able to appreciate the bright outlook that now lies before them. For "we have changed all that" during these three years. We have grown in knowledge by sad experience: we have learned our lesson so far, at any rate, as to turn our backs upon the past with thankfulness, and to welcome the prospect of work worth the name of Research which the President of the Alliance set forth in his recent address.

We shall have occasion hereafter to recur to other matters therein set forth. For the present we desire to fix attention on the bearing of this plan of research on the question of Public Mediumship which Mr. Shorter handled so exhaustively three years since. It goes without saying that the abolition of payment by results will cut away one great source of temptation to which Mr. Shorter drew attention. It will remove from a weak person the temptation to "assist phenomena" when they are weak, or to counterfeited them when they are absent. It will go far, together with the absence of darkness, and of unknown observers promiscuously gathered together at haphazard, to prevent a medium from being placed in an equivocal position. Our attention will be increasingly drawn to the study of that most important question—the influence of conditions on the phenomena, and on the medium himself. Already we know that if we are to hope for good results we must provide good conditions, and above all that we must surround the medium with a harmonious circle who will treat him with tenderness and care, and shield him from injury that ignorance or malice might inflict.

The Spiritualistic public has much to hope for from a rational system of investigation such as that now laid before them. They may reasonably expect an extension of their knowledge of the causes which produce familiar effects; they may hope gradually to dispel the mists of ignorance and prejudice which hang round the subject in the popular mind, albeit in a decreasing degree year by year; they may hope to prick many an inflated theory, and show the hollow emptiness of what looked so fairly rounded till it collapsed. The public at large has much to gain by the clearing away of obstacles to rational investigation; by the sweeping away of vulgarity, folly, and a nauseous kind of cant that have repelled from the threshold of inquiry many a weak-minded investigator whose interest was not robust enough to save him from disgust; by the repression of ill-regulated enthusiasm and the development of reasonable methods of inquiry and research. But the medium has most of all to gain: by protection from insult and injury from foolish, or ignorant, or malicious persons; by his removal from equivocal conditions, under which it is almost impossible to distinguish perfect sincerity from consummate trickery; by the development of his powers under guarded conditions carefully carried out, so that they may be brought to perfection without risk of injury to his health, whether of body, soul, or spirit.

A RESIDENT in Southport desires to meet with Spiritualists in that locality with a view to forming private circles for investigation.—Address, Editor of "LIGHT."

DEATH is the sunset of our material existence; to-morrow the spiritual sun of a brighter and more beautiful day will appear in the firmament of our being, that shall stand at high meridian of that eternal day whose horizon is crimsoned with the never-fading light of immortality.—DR. C. C. PEET.

A SPIRITUALIST residing in Dublin complains that through the action of Messrs. Smith and Son, it is difficult to procure "LIGHT," and still more difficult to make the acquaintance of Spiritualists. If any of our readers residing in that city would care to meet another investigator, they can be put into communication upon application to the Editor.

MEETINGS for Spiritualists are held every Sunday at the Regent Hotel, near Baker-street Station. On Sunday next, 13th inst., at seven o'clock, Mr. C. C. Massey will deliver a lecture entitled "The Relation of Faith to Evidence in Research." On the following Sunday the speaker for the evening will be Mr. A. F. Tondall, who has chosen for his subject "Occultism."

"SHE told me that in all that she considered her best writing there was a 'not herself' which took possession of her, and that she felt her own personality to be merely the instrument through which this spirit, as it were, was acting. Particularly she dwelt on this in regard to the scene in 'Middlemarch' between Dorothea and Rosamond, saying that although she always knew they had, sooner or later, to come together, she kept the idea resolutely out of her mind until Dorothea was in Rosamond's drawing-room; then abandoning herself to the inspiration of the moment, she wrote the whole scene exactly as it stands, without alteration, or erasure, in an intense state of excitement and agitation, feeling herself entirely possessed by the feelings of the two women."—Extract from the "Life of George Eliot," by her husband.

The above list represents the remittances and promises which have reached us up to the time of going to press. The amount at present is not very encouraging, but as our friends have never failed us in the past, so we have no fear that they will do so now. "LIGHT" is steadily growing in circulation and influence, and promises at no very distant day to be not only self-supporting, but commercially profitable; and in the meantime we earnestly appeal for the assistance of all who are interested in our success, begging them to be both prompt and generous in their contributions. With more means at our command we could make our work more widely known, and thus hasten the time when such appeals as this will be no longer needed.

Remittances may be sent either to Mr. E. Dawson Rogers, Rose Villa, Church End, Finchley, N., or to Mr. M. Theobald, 62, Granville Park, Lewisham, S.E.

MAGNETIC SYMPATHY.—"I have often noticed," writes Mrs. S. Seip in Golden Gate, "my watch to have gained considerably when I have been under the influence of buoyant feelings; and on the contrary to have lost when very depressed in my mind. I have observed also, while wearing a friend's watch, which she said went too fast or too slow, that it kept accurate time while I wore it. It is a question with me whether all strongly magnetic persons would find their watches vary in this way according to their states of feeling."

RECORDS OF PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

[In this column will be given from time to time such accounts of psychical phenomena as seem to be worthy of permanent record. Beyond the general classification indicated, no attempt at tabulation will at present be made; that work will follow in due course. In furtherance of this object we shall be pleased to receive from our readers brief reports of phenomena subject to two conditions: (1) That a colourless statement of facts without comment is given; and (2) that communications are accompanied by the names and addresses of those concerned, not necessarily for publication, though we should naturally prefer to be at liberty to publish them. Amongst the phenomena referred to may be mentioned:—

CLASS C.—CLAIRVOYANCE.

If evidence of spirit-knowledge of our worldly affairs is acceptable in your columns I beg to offer an example. Being much perplexed on a business matter some weeks ago, I thought I would try a spirit medium, and called on Miss Lottie Fowler, of 16, Bury-street, Bloomsbury, whose name I had often heard. I found her a most remarkable sensitive. She did not wait to hear me state my case, but at once began to tell me what were the subjects on which I had to consult her, and pointed out in detail the course to be taken. This course was not in accord with my own views of the situation, but I followed her advice, and, I am pleased to say, with the most satisfactory result, and it was afterwards evident that if I had carried out my own notions I should have been wrong. The medium also, without asking questions, or attempting to get the slightest clue, gave me particulars and minute personal descriptions of a number of my relatives who have been "dead" many years, and some of whom had not been in my thoughts for perhaps a quarter of a century.

For instance, she stated that a spirit was with me who gave the name of "Margaret," and who she said had passed away between twenty and thirty years. This was an aunt who used to take a good deal of interest in me when I was a lad. "Jane" was the name of another spirit present, and who used to live with Margaret as an adopted child, and a cousin and playmate of mine.

In the case of my wife the particulars were even more striking. Not only were the descriptions of the personal appearance of her mother and sister, who left the body many years ago, most accurate, but the times of passing away, and the complaints they suffered from were correctly given. The medium also said that my wife's mother came to live with us in the latter part of her time here, and died at our house; and that there was some unpleasantness with one member of the family who had not behaved well to her; all which was the truth. We had suspected peculiar treatment of the kind indicated, yet had no proof, but at this séance the medium said the spirit distinctly told her who was the offending person, and gave the name—a very peculiar one—which perfectly confirmed our suspicions. The medium also told my wife the names of sisters and brothers she had lost, how long they were ill, and what they died of; that one of the family recently came to this country from abroad, and wanted to borrow money, and a number of other incidents of this nature—all of which were correct, and of which we know the medium could have had no personal knowledge.

A remarkable feature in these séances is that no "leading" questions are asked by the medium, no cross-examination or sifting of any kind, but the details and facts come out with a volubility and accuracy which almost takes one's breath away. Miss Fowler's forte appears to be the identification of, and communication with, departed friends and relations. The séance was at Miss Lottie Fowler's room (16, Bury-street, Bloomsbury). I went straight there without making an appointment. Except that two years ago I went to her once in the same way, and without divulging my name, she was entirely unacquainted with myself or family.

CLASS I.—HAUNTED HOUSE

We lived some seven years ago for a year in a house near Oxford Circus, which before our tenancy had not been inhabited for several years. We noticed that the landlord was exceedingly anxious to secure us.

One night about 10.30, I went to the post, being absent about three minutes. On returning I found my wife in the sitting-room upstairs, in tears and quite prostrate with terror. She said that she had gone out on the landing and looked down the stairs, expecting me, when she heard a noise which came nearer and nearer, and seemed just as if a person, walking upstairs, were slapping one hand upon the wall (the gas was burning on the landing). Finally the sound came close to her, and an invisible hand seemed to be clapped in her face. She immediately fled back into the room, and was more frightened than she had ever been in her life.

My wife's sister, a complete sceptic, saw one day, at three o'clock in the afternoon in full sunlight, a white figure standing at the door of the sitting-room where she was lying upon a sofa, and also heard heavy feet going upstairs very late at night, sounds which were quite unaccountable. The walls of our house did not join the walls of the neighbouring houses, so that the sounds could not have come from them.

Servants complained continually of the noises and left. After leaving we heard quite accidentally that the house had a reputation for being haunted.

CLASS L.—MATERIALISATION.

On Tuesday, November 18th, I witnessed a materialisation séance at 6, Nottingham-place, Mr. Eglinton being the psychic. The séance commenced at about 8 p.m., in an upper room overlooking the street, an adjoining bath-room being used as the cabinet. This bath-room, which had two doorways, one leading into the séance room and one on to the landing, was examined by the sitters, and the door leading on to the landing locked and secured with a strip of stamp edging. The doorway into the séance room was closed with curtains. The sitters, six ladies and two gentlemen, were then arranged in a semi-circle reaching from the corner of the séance room directly opposite the cabinet, which I shall call the head of the circle, to the bath-room wall. My own position was third in the circle, counting from the head. Within reach of the right hand of the gentleman at the head of the circle stood a gas-lamp which was alight during the séance, there being always light enough for me to see the arrangement of the room and the position of the sitters, as well as to distinguish with ease the features of those sitting on either hand and their immediate neighbours. The sitters having joined hands, Mr. Eglinton, after remaining awhile outside the cabinet, paced up and down and made passes over each member of the circle. A bluish light was seen intermittently over the region of his heart, and other lights of a more vivid nature were noticeable in his vicinity during this part of the sitting. He then entered the cabinet, and soon a voice, purporting to be that of "Joey," one of the psychic's "guides," was heard conversing familiarly with the circle. After a short time the curtains parted, and a form appeared which was recognised by one of the sitters as the likeness of a deceased friend. During the sitting no less than eight forms were recognised by different sitters, each sitter recognising one at least, some two. These forms, which were very characteristic in appearance, represented men, women, and children. Eleven came during the evening, two of these being the medium's "guides," "Joey" and "Ernest." In one case two forms came together, a full-grown man and a child. Towards the end of the séance Mr. Eglinton himself came out of the cabinet, apparently in a state of trance. He advanced to the head of the circle and walked up and down. After a little while a small piece of muslin-like drapery appeared apparently from beneath the left side of his waistcoat. This lengthened gradually till it reached the floor, where it began to work about as though some living thing were beneath it. It then gradually rose in the form of an irregular cone till it reached about the height of Mr. Eglinton's shoulder, when suddenly the appearance of a man stood there, a man with black hair, beard, and moustache, clad in a white garment, and carrying like a mantle the piece of drapery that had been evolved from the medium's side. The form was quite as large as that of the psychic, but the cone of material did not appear to be at any time large enough to conceal a man, even had he been much smaller. This form I understood to be that of "Ernest," one of Mr. Eglinton's "guides." This phenomenon took place near the head of the circle, close to the gas-light and within four feet of my seat. Mr. Eglinton from the beginning to the end was the centre of attraction for eight pairs of eyes, some in front, some sideways, and some behind, so that fraud seemed practically impossible, as the passage of a full grown man into the bunch of drapery, had such a thing occurred, could not fail to have been noticed by some, if not all. The form soon drew Mr. Eglinton back into the cabinet, supporting him meanwhile. Several times while this manifestation was in progress I and other sitters supported him, as he appeared unable to stand steadily. The tread of this form, as well as of other forms, could be heard distinctly. After this episode the séance continued in the usual way, the last form to appear being that of a child bearing a light, which, however, could not get far enough away from the cabinet to be identified. After the conclusion of the séance the sitters again examined the cabinet and found the door locked and the stamp edging intact. Mr. Eglinton looked very pale and exhausted. These are solely personal impressions of this remarkable séance. I have not compared notes with the other sitters, and do not speak on their behalf.

CLASS I.—HAUNTED HOUSE.

My mother, some twenty years ago, paid a visit to L—Grange, North Lincolnshire. After taking a seat in the drawing-room, a tall, dark looking man appeared at the door, gazed at her silently and went away. The servant coming, my mother mentioned that Mr. R. (the owner of the house) had been there. The servant said it was impossible as Mr. R. was at dinner. She had been waiting, and was quite certain he had not left the room. And upon proceeding to the dining-room, my mother found that Mr. R. was quite a different looking man; but upon the wall was the likeness of a gentleman which she immediately recognised as that of the person who had stood silently gazing at her. This led to an explanation that the house was, in fact, haunted, and by a fac simile of this figure in the picture. There were also noises to be heard in the house, of which the most characteristic was like the banging of a door upon its chain. Everybody would get up, thinking burglars were in the house, but no cause for the sound was ever discovered.—INQUIRER.

[The full names of L—Grange and of Mr. R. will be communicated to any inquirer who may be in a position to ascertain whether the ghost mentioned in the following story still walks, or to obtain any other additional information. If he be a telepathite, to encourage him we will suggest to him a telepathic explanation, and it will be entirely his own fault if it shall seem to travesty his views.

It may be that the man in the picture being quite different from Mr. R., Mrs. R. may have gradually come to consider him the exact image of what a man should be, and have conceived a nameless longing one day to see just such a man. With every new visitor therefore, while still uncertain who it might be, she might feel a wild throb of expectancy that at last her heart's desire was realised. And thus our melancholy Mariana might project her imagination into the sensorium of each visitor in turn.

It is true the theory seems complicated, and there is the discrepancy of the door banging.

Of course, it is a "tentative and provisional" theory.]

CLASS N.—AUDIBLE VOICE.

About twenty years ago an intimate friend of all my family was recovering from a severe illness, and as soon as she was deemed capable of supporting the journey, a change of place to a considerable distance was arranged for her. As it was of the utmost importance for her to have a good night in order to prepare her for the journey next day, all the household were sent to bed early and perfect quiet enjoined throughout the house. A devoted friend whose name was Ellen went to bed with her in order to be close at hand in case of need. About an hour after the invalid had lain down, she was suddenly startled by a loud outcry, "Nellie! Nellie!" as if a person was in urgent need of immediate assistance, and it occurred to her that some one might have slipped in in the dark, and was hanging over the banisters. She turned anxiously to her friend and tried to rouse her. She made no offer to rise, however, and only said in a very marked way, "Did you hear that voice? It was my mother. I hear it constantly."

OCCULT PHYSICAL ACTION.

About the year 1862 or 1863, the friend above mentioned had a broad gold ring which she had worn constantly for four or five years. A gentleman who was staying in the house told her he had been present at a séance where a lady who was very sceptical on the subject, had challenged the spirits, saying, "Well, if you will break this ring on my finger I will believe in you;" when, greatly to her surprise, the ring was mysteriously broken in two. My friend, who was equally sceptical, turning round the ring on her finger, and said lightly that she should not mind making the same promise if they would do the same with that ring. She thought no more about the matter, but when she came to take off the ring at night she found there was a sharp cut through the back of the ring which she was perfectly sure had not been there in the morning, and which a jeweller said could only have been done by a sharp jeweller's tool. At a subsequent period she was much vexed when a jeweller, who had the ring for another purpose, soldered up the cut of his own accord.

The friend from whom I had the two foregoing stories is a woman in whose careful veracity I have entire confidence. I took them down from her words and submitted the narrative for her correction.

LEEDS SPIRITUAL SCIENCE SOCIETY.

Opening of the Oriel Hall, Cookridge Street, Leeds, on Sunday, December 6th, 1885.

The Society opening the above hall has been known hitherto as the Sheepscar Spiritual Society. The name has now been altered to the Spiritual Science Society, and it is expected from the associations of the place (having been till lately occupied by the Yorkshire College) that the more intellectual portion of the community will be attracted. The mediums who have already promised their support are considered the best instruments in the district now before the public, and every hope is entertained that the opening will be the starting-point of a new and progressive movement in Leeds. The room is large and comfortable, seating 500, situate in the centre of the town, on one of the tram-routes. For the purpose a room more suitable can hardly be imagined; it has a commodious gallery and is heated with hot-water pipes; the acoustic properties are good, and it has the advantage of being level with the street, being reached through a large entrance-hall, with nicely tessellated pavement. By the time fixed for the morning service, 10.30, a large audience of Spiritualists, investigators, and friends had assembled, and the meeting was formally opened by Mr. Scott, the chairman of the Society, who, in a very practical address, traced the progress of Spiritualism through its various stages in Leeds, and fully explained the lines upon which it was proposed to carry on the association in the new rooms. Mrs. Groom, of Birmingham, while under spirit influence, then christened an infant, brought upon the platform for the purpose, the name Millicent being given, afterwards giving a discourse which was a complete explanation of the laws and principles of Spiritualism, and the benefit it brought to its believers. Many strangers being present at the opening service, the discourse was peculiarly fitting to the occasion. After the discourse Mrs. Groom improvised a number of poems on words selected by the audience, and also described a number of spirits present. She was singularly fortunate in her delineations, the majority of the descriptions being immediately recognised.—In the afternoon Mr. and Mrs. Hopworth, of Leeds, occupied the platform, the guides of Mr. Hopworth discoursing on the "Dawn of Truth." They defined truth as that which, when placed upon the pedestal of time and assailed by hostile critics at all points, remained unmoved and immovable. Theories which were once regarded as truth have been proved by science to be fallacies. For instance, the earth was for centuries held to be flat, until Galileo, in spite of all opposition, proved it to be round. That the world was created in six literal days was looked upon as truth until science solved the problem of evolution. Spiritualism has been attacked by all the weapons that man could bring against it, but it still remains the same, unmoved and immovable. Science in her war with error would find a valuable ally in Spiritualism. Further arguments were used to show that the advent of Spiritualism was the dawn of new truth. The lecture was delivered in a clear and telling manner. Mrs. Hepworth afterwards gave a number of clairvoyant descriptions, most of which were readily recognised. —The evening service was a pronounced success, the large hall being completely filled, many having to go away for want of even standing room. Mrs. Groom continued her discourse in the same strain as at the morning service, and concluded an eloquent address by describing the advantages which would accrue to humanity and the world at large if the principles of Spiritualism were more generally acted upon, not only in the daily life of the individual, but in the affairs of nations. One of the subjects given to Mrs. Groom for a poem was "The Dedication of the Oriel Hall." After the discourse and the four impromptu poems given by Mrs. Groom in the evening, the chairman caused a sensation by relating the circumstances of the aggressive action of three gentlemen, twenty months ago. These persons had been appealed to by the Young Women's Christian Association to dislodge the Spiritualists from a large room, which they occupied adjoining the Y.W.C.A. premises, because "they had to do with the devil." Mr. Thomas Harvey was one of the gentlemen. The chairman acknowledged that he was a philanthropist, but unfortunately of very narrow religious ideas. This gentleman passed away on Christmas Day last. Shortly afterwards the story got noised about the town that the ghost of Thomas Harvey had been seen approaching the Friends' Meeting House, Leeds, at the moment of his "death": The chairman said he fully believed it, for thousands of similar appearances had been recorded all over the world. The explanation of the case he believed was this. Immediately the spirit leaves the body it is, in many cases, unconscious of the fact of the so-called "death" having taken place, and goes mechanically to the place where its chief interests lay. Thomas Harvey, therefore, naturally dwelling upon the thought of "What of the hereafter?" would go in spirit to his place of worship. The gentleman who saw the apparition was surprised at seeing Thomas Harvey out of doors at that time. He was the more surprised on opening the street door to find that Thomas Harvey was not to be seen! The chairman further related that at a home circle, with three sitters present, in addition to a developed home medium, they were expecting to have a certain control. Instead of the expected spirit friend speaking through the medium, a stranger was evidently making a great effort to communicate. After a while the medium put out his hand, and said with emotion, "May God bless you in your noble work. I hope your new hall will not be taken away from you. When on earth I was your enemy." In answer to "Pray give me your name," the control said "Harvey." The spirit had then, perforce, to release control, and another one came who was well-known. Further information was then given of Mr. Harvey's condition in the spirit-world, and a message to the effect that he desired the chairman to make a statement in the new hall. He hoped by reparation to raise himself. The chairman then said that the previous evening (Saturday), being at home, and Mrs. Groom his guest, he said to that lady, "Do you see any stranger present? I won't say whether male or female, young or old." Mrs. Groom gave a description of a strange spirit present, a description which a gentleman who was also present and who had known Thomas Harvey for sixteen years, said could not be so well given by him. The chairman added he had had many proofs of Thomas Harvey being continuously with him, and he hoped to raise him to a truer spirituality. —Mrs. Groom then gave about thirty clairvoyant descriptions of spirits surrounding individuals in the audience, all of whom, except one, were recognised. Altogether, Sunday last was a red-letter day for Spiritualism in Leeds. —Mrs. Groom spoke in the same hall again on the Monday night with great success.

The barque which thou hast to guide is thy physical body, which is now sailing down the river of life. Along the shores of this river are many false lights which will tempt thee to approach their alluring rays. Many have been attracted by them, like the moth to the flame, thinking thereby to gain happiness. But instead of happiness they have found misery; instead of joy, sorrow; instead of health and strength, sickness and death. —ALFRED KITSON.

THE EXPERIMENTAL RESEARCH SECTION

OF THE

LONDON SPIRITUALIST ALLIANCE

Has been established with the object primarily of—

Promoting systematic research by experts, including (a) the encouragement of exact methods of inquiry; (b) the accurate recording of observed facts; (c) the regulation of admission to and the graduation of circles, so as to afford a complete and progressive course of investigation and instruction; (d) the more careful treatment of mediums, and (e) the publication in the Spiritualist Press of carefully tabulated results.

And secondarily of—

Assisting inquiry into Spiritualism either by (a) directing inquirers, where necessary, in a preliminary course of reading; (b) advising in the formation of private family circles; or (c) where practicable furnishing introductions to already organised circles.

Members of the London Spiritualist Alliance are eligible for election to the Experimental Research Section. The minimum subscription to this section is £1 1s. per annum, payable in January for the current year, but it is hoped that persons interested in the extension of research will contribute to a special fund for that purpose.

The members of the Research Section are divided into four grades, viz. :—

1. CIRCLES OF EXPERTS,
2. ELEMENTARY CIRCLES OF INVESTIGATORS,
3. INQUIRERS,

all under the direction of

4. A CENTRAL COMMITTEE OF CONTROL.

Circles of Experts will study, at their own discretion and opportunity, special groups of phenomena. They will especially direct attention to the means of securing the best conditions of observation. Their experiments will be such as could not safely be made in a less harmonious circle, or by less experienced persons. They will as experiment as to throw light on perplexing problems, and generally to add to our now scanty store of knowledge as to the methods employed by the invisible operators, the results of whose action we are all more or less acquainted with, but of whose methods of operation we know almost nothing.

Inquirers into Spiritualism, upon becoming members of the Research Section, will, if desired, be introduced to some Expert who will give the necessary advice and guidance; will direct their reading, if required; will give help in difficulty, and generally act as Mentor and sponsor to them, until, in due time, they become fit to take their place in an elementary Circle of Investigators. As circumstances allow, inquirers will be drafted into such a circle, or if it be preferred they will be advised and directed in the formation of a private circle.

GENERAL RULES.

All groups of circles of whatever degree are subject absolutely to the direction and governance of a Central Committee of Control. The names of all who desire to take part in these circles will be submitted to that Committee, and the election will be by ballot. Great care will be exercised in the selection of suitable persons, and their arrangement in circles so composed as to secure the utmost possible harmony. These circles will meet, each at its own convenience, in private houses for the most part, and their proceedings will be strictly private. They will be conducted by an Expert Director chosen by the members and approved by the Central Committee of Control. Accurate minutes of all proceedings will be kept by a Recorder; and these minutes, verified at the opening of each meeting, will be submitted at stated intervals to the Committee of Control, who alone will decide as to their publication. No publication will be permissible without the sanction of the Committee; and from its decision there will be no appeal. Each member of the various circles will pledge himself to keep all proceedings strictly private until authority is given for publication. The names of the persons who constitute a particular circle need be known only to themselves and to the Committee of Control.

PLEDGES REQUIRED.

Those who wish to take part in this work will be invited to pledge themselves

1. To an ungrudging assistance, within reasonable bounds, to any fellow member who may be assigned to them for guidance.
2. To sink absolutely any private or personal feelings that may in any way be thought likely to interfere with the perfect harmony that must characterise an inquiry of this nature if success is to be attained; or that may be at variance with the spirit in which alone this investigation can be profitably undertaken.
3. To obey, and submit to the reasonable control, of the Central Committee of Control, which is charged with the administration of this plan, and to preserve a faithful reticence as to any results obtained in any circle, until the records are published by order of that Committee.

No expression of opinion as to theories which may be held to account for observed facts, or acceptance of any special form of belief, is sought from any member. The Central Committee of Control, however, regards psychical facts from a Spiritualist point of view, though it is by no means bound down to any special theory, and may, indeed, receive and canvass any that may be proposed; and the Spiritualist Alliance, as its name implies, is, as a body, professedly Spiritualistic.

CENTRAL COMMITTEE OF CONTROL.

The constitution of this body, together with other details explanatory of the general scheme of work, will be found in the pamphlet entitled, "Spiritualism at Home and Abroad." Persons wishing to join the Experimental Research Section are requested, if already members of the London Spiritualist Alliance, to apply to the President, 16, Craven-street, Charing Cross, S.W., who will enter into further communication with them on the subject. If not members of the Alliance, application for such membership should first be made to the Hon. Sec. at the same address. On election, the new member of the Alliance will be eligible for admission, if approved by the Central Committee of Control, to the Experimental Research Section.

WHAT IS SAID OF PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

J. H. FICHTE, THE GERMAN PHILOSOPHER AND AUTHOR.—"Notwithstanding my age (83) and my exemption from the controversies of the day, I feel it my duty to bear testimony to the great fact of Spiritualism. No one should keep silent."

PROFESSOR DE MORGAN, PRESIDENT OF THE MATHEMATICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.—"I am perfectly convinced that I have both seen and heard, in a manner which should make unbelief impossible, things called spiritual, which cannot be taken by a rational being to be capable of explanation by imposture, coincidence, or mistake. So far I feel the ground firm under me."

DR. ROBERT CHAMBERS.—"I have for many years known that these phenomena are real, as distinguished from imposture; and it is not of yesterday that I concluded they were calculated to explain much that has been doubtful in the past; and, when fully accepted, revolutionise the whole frame of human opinion on many important matters."—Extract from a Letter to A. Russel Wallace.

PROFESSOR HARE, EMERITUS PROFESSOR OF CHEMISTRY IN THE UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA.—"Far from abating my confidence in the inferences respecting the agencies of the spirits of deceased mortals, in the manifestations of which I have given an account in my work, I have, within the last nine months" (this was written in 1858), "had more striking evidences of that agency than those given in the work in question."

PROFESSOR CHALLIS, THE LATE PLUMERIAN PROFESSOR OF ASTRONOMY AT CAMBRIDGE.—"I have been unable to resist the large amount of testimony to such facts, which has come from many independent sources, and from a vast number of witnesses. . . . In short, the testimony has been so abundant and contemporaneous, that either the facts must be admitted to be such as are reported, or the possibility of certifying facts by human testimony must be given up."—Clerical Journal, June, 1862.

PROFESSOR GREGORY, F.R.S.E.—"The essential question is this, What are the proofs of the agency of departed spirits? Although I cannot say that I yet feel the sure and firm conviction on this point which I feel on some others, I am bound to say that the higher phenomena, recorded by so many truthful and honourable men, appear to me to render the spiritual hypothesis almost certain. . . . I believe that if I could myself see the higher phenomena alluded to I should be satisfied, as are all those who have had the best means of judging of the truth of the spiritual theory."

LORD BROUGHAM.—"There is but one question I would ask the author, Is the Spiritualism of this work foreign to our materialistic, manufacturing age? No; for amidst the varieties of mind which divers circumstances produce are found those who cultivate man's highest faculties; to these the author addresses himself. But even in the most cloudless skies of scepticism I see a rain-cloud, if it be no bigger than a man's hand; it is modern Spiritualism."—Preface by Lord Brougham to "The Book of Nature," by C. O. Groom Napier, F.C.S.

THE LONDON DIALECTICAL COMMITTEE reported: "1. That sounds of a very varied character, apparently proceeding from articles of furniture, the floor and walls of the room—the vibrations accompanying which sounds are often distinctly perceptible to the touch—occur, without being produced by muscular action or mechanical contrivance. 2. That movements of heavy bodies take place without mechanical contrivance, of any kind, or adequate exertion of muscular force by those present, and frequently without contact or connection with any person. 3. That these sounds and movements often occur at the time and in the manner asked for by persons present, and, by means of a simple code of signals, answer questions and spell out coherent communications."

PROFESSOR BARRETT, F.R.S.E.—"I know and rejoice in the blessing Spiritualism has been to my own faith, and to that of several dear friends of mine. Moreover, I cordially recognise the fact that in bereavement and deep distress numbers have been cheered and consoled by the hope that Spiritualism has set before them. . . . So far from Materialism being true, I do not believe a single person has ever yet lived on this earth who has truly and heartily desired to know if an intelligent and personal existence be possible without our present bodily organism, and has steadily set himself to solve this supreme question with all the help he can gain from every source.—I say I do not believe any such earnest seeker after truth has ever failed to obtain a clear and definite answer in the affirmative."

CAMILLE FLAMMARION, THE FRENCH ASTRONOMER, AND MEMBER OF THE ACADEMIE FRANCAISE.—"I do not hesitate to affirm my conviction, based on personal examination of the subject, that any scientific man who declares the phenomena denominated 'magnetic,' 'somnambulic,' 'mediumic,' and others not yet explained by science to be 'impossible,' is one who speaks without knowing what he is talking about; and also any man accustomed, by his professional avocations, to scientific observation—provided that his mind be not biased by pre-conceived opinions, nor his mental vision blinded by that opposite kind of illusion, unhappily too common in the learned world, which consists in imagining that the laws of Nature are already known to us, and that everything which appears to overstep the limit of our present formulas is impossible—may acquire a radical and absolute certainty of the reality of the facts alluded to."

CROMWELL F. VARLEY, F.R.S.—"Twenty-five years ago I was a hard-headed unbeliever. . . . Spiritual phenomena, however, suddenly and quite unexpectedly, were soon after developed in my own family. . . . This led me to inquire and to try numerous experiments in such a way as to preclude, as much as circumstances would permit, the possibility of trickery and self-deception. . . . He then details various phases of the phenomena which had come within the range of his personal experience, and continues: "Other and numerous phenomena have occurred, proving the existence (a) of forces unknown to science; (b) the power of instantly reading my thoughts; (c) the presence of some intelligence or intelligences controlling those powers. . . . That the phenomena occur there is overwhelming evidence, and it is too late now to deny their existence."

ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, F.G.S.—"My position, therefore, is that the phenomena of Spiritualism in their entirety do not require further confirmation. They are proved, quite as well as any facts can be proved in other sciences, and it is not denial or quibbling that can disprove any of them, but only fresh facts and accurate deductions from those facts. When the opponents of Spiritualism can give a record of their researches approaching in duration and completeness to those of its advocates; and when they can discover and show in detail, either how the phenomena are produced or how the many sane and able men here referred to have been deluded into a coincident belief that they have witnessed them; and when they can prove the correctness of their theory by producing a like belief in a body of equally sane and able believers—then, and not till then, will it be necessary for Spiritualists to produce fresh confirmation of facts which are, and always have been, sufficiently real and indisputable to satisfy any honest and persevering inquirer."—Miracles and Modern Spiritualism.

DR. LOCKHART ROBERTSON.—"The writer" (i.e., Dr. L. Robertson) "can now no more doubt the physical manifestations of so-called Spiritualism than he would any other fact, as, for example, the fall of the apple to the ground, of which his senses informed him. As stated above, there was no place or chance of any legerdemain, or fraud, in these physical manifestations. He is aware, even from recent experience, of the impossibility of convincing anyone, by a mere narrative of events apparently so out of harmony with all our knowledge of the laws which govern the physical world, and he places these facts on record rather as an act of justice due to those whose similar statements he had elsewhere doubted and denied, than with either the desire or hope of convincing others. Yet he cannot doubt the ultimate recognition of facts of the truth of which he is so thoroughly convinced. Admit these physical manifestations, and a strange and wide world of research is opened to our inquiry. This field is new to the materialist mind of the last two centuries, which even in the writings of divines of the English Church, doubts and denies all spiritual manifestations and agencies, be they good or evil."—From a letter by Dr. Lockhart Robertson, published in the Dialectical Society's Report on Spiritualism, p. 24.

NASSAU WILLIAM SENIOR.—"No one can doubt that phenomena like these (Phrenology, Homeopathy, and Mesmerism) deserve to be observed, recorded, and arranged; and whether we call by the name of mesmerism, or by any other name, the science which proposes to do this, is a mere question of nomenclature. Among those who profess this science there may be careless observers, prejudiced recorders, and rash systematisers; their errors and defects may impede the progress of knowledge, but they will not stop it. And we have no doubt that, before the end of this century, the wonders which perplex almost equally those who accept and those who reject modern mesmerism will be distributed into defined classes, and found subject to ascertained laws—in other words, will become the subjects of a science. These views will prepare us for the following statement, made in the Spiritual Magazine, 1864, p. 336: 'We have only to add, as a further tribute to the attainments and honours of Mr. Senior, that he was by long inquiry and experience a firm believer in spiritual power and manifestations. Mr. Home was his frequent guest, and Mr. Senior made no secret of his belief among his friends. He it was who recommended the publication of Mr. Home's recent work by Messrs. Longmans, and the incidents there given, which happened to a near and dear member of his family.'

WHAT CONJURERS SAY ABOUT PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

Mediums, who are the instruments of an external agency, have, more than once, been confronted with conjurers who deceive by sleight of hand; and in the same manner that no man of science who has thoroughly and fairly investigated the phenomena has failed to become convinced of their reality, so no conjurer who has been confronted with the same facts has been able to explain their occurrence by prestidigitation. Houdin, Jacobs, Bellachini, Hermann, Kellar, and others have already confessed their powerlessness to produce under the same conditions what occurs without human intervention in the presence of a medium.

Testimony of Robert Houdin.

The Marquis d'Esdes de Mirville published during the lifetime of Houdin two letters from the latter, in his "Mémoire adressé à MM. les membres de l'Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques, sur un grand nombre de phénomènes merveilleux intéressant également la Religion, la Science, et les hommes du Monde," in which the conjurer confesses his inability to explain the phenomena he witnessed in the presence of Alexis, the clairvoyant. A circumstantial account is given of M. de Mirville's visit to Houdin for the purpose of engaging him in this investigation, of the latter's confidence in his own ability to detect the trick, and of what took place at the séance, the conditions of which were entirely under Houdin's control. This account extends over twelve pages, and its accuracy is confirmed by Houdin in the first of the documents now translated:—

"Although very far from accepting the enigmas which M. — is good enough to bestow upon me, and especially insisting that I am not at all committed to opinions, either in favour of magnetism or against it, I can, nevertheless, not refrain from declaring that the facts above reported are entirely correct (sont de la plus complète exactitude), and that, the more I reflect upon them, the more impossible I find it to rank them among those which belong to my art and profession."

"9th May, 1847."

ROBERT HOUDIN."

A fortnight later, M. de Mirville received another letter, in which the following, referring to another séance, occurs:—

"I have, therefore, returned from this séance as astonished as it is possible to be, and persuaded that it is utterly impossible that chance or skill could ever produce effects so wonderful (tout à fait impossible que le hasard ou l'adresse puisse jamais produire des effets aussi merveilleux).— I am, monsieur, &c.,

"May 16th, 1847."

(Signed) ROBERT HOUDIN."

Testimony of Harry Kellar.

Harry Kellar, a distinguished professor of legerdemain, investigated the slate-writing phenomena which occurred in the presence of Mr. Eglinton, at Calcutta, in January, 1882, and on the 25th of that month he addressed a letter to the editor of the Indian Daily News, in which he said:—

"In your issue of the 13th January I stated that I should be glad of an opportunity of participating in a séance with a view of giving an unbiased opinion as to whether, in my capacity of a professional prestidigitator, I could give a natural explanation of effects said to be produced by spiritual aid."

"I am indebted to the courtesy of Mr. Eglinton, the Spiritualistic medium now in Calcutta, and of his host, Mr. J. Meugens, for affording me the opportunity I craved."

"It is needless to say I went as a sceptic, but I must own that I have come away utterly unable to explain, by any natural means, the phenomena that I witnessed on Tuesday evening. I will give a brief description of what took place."

After describing several successful experiments, Mr. Kellar proceeds:—

"In respect to the above manifestations, I can only say that I do not expect my account of them to gain general credence. Forty-eight hours before I should not have believed anyone who described such manifestations under similar circumstances. I still remain a sceptic as regards Spiritualism, but I repeat my inability to explain or account for what must have been an intelligent force that produced the writing on the slate, which, if my senses are to be relied on, was in no way the result of trickery or sleight of hand."

On the 30th of the same month Mr. Kellar addressed another letter to the Indian Daily News, reporting some experiences of another kind with Mr. Eglinton, and regarding which he said:—

"In conclusion, let me state that after a most stringent trial and strict scrutiny of these wonderful experiences I can arrive at no other conclusion than that there was no trace of trickery in any form; nor was there in the room any mechanism or machinery by which could be produced the phenomena which had taken place. The ordinary mode by which Maskelyne and other conjurers imitate levitation or the floating test could not possibly be done in the room in which we were assembled."

The Testimony of Professor Jacobs.

Professor Jacobs, writing to the editor of Licht, mehr Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—

"Spite of the assertions, more or less trustworthy, of the French and English journalists, and spite of the foolish jealousies of ignorant conjurers, I feel it my duty to show up the bad faith of one party and the chicanery of the other. All that has been said or done adverse to these American mediums is absolutely untrustworthy. If we would rightly judge of a thing we must understand it, and neither the journalists nor the conjurers possessed the most elementary knowledge of the science that governs these phenomena. As a prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the medianistic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect."

"Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. If (as I have every reason to hope) the psychical studies, to which I am applying myself at this time, succeed, I shall be able to establish clearly, and that by public demonstration, the immense line of demarcation which separates medianistic phenomena from conjuring proper, and then equivocation will be no longer possible, and persons will have to yield to evidence, or deny through predetermination to deny."

"Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also the individuality of the spirit in 'spiritual manifestation.' I authorise you, dear sir, to insert this letter in your next number, if agreeable to you." &c., &c.

Testimony of Samuel Bellachini.

Samuel Bellachini, Court Conjurer at Berlin, made the following declaration in December, 1877:—

"I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Berne; Butlerof, in St. Petersburg, to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the 'How' of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a notary and witnesses."

ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By "M.A. (Oxon.)."

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct séances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experiences in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two, of negative, passive temperaments, and preferably of the female sex, the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each sitter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Scepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitter spirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear. Patience is essential, and it may be necessary to meet ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such a trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful séance.

The first indications of success usually are a cold breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twittings of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not adding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over, but not in contact with, it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if it attempt to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might disconcert an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will check noisy manifestations.

Lastly, Try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your reason. Do not enter into a very solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well-grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.

PHASES OF MATERIALIZATION.

IN THE

OBJECTIVE PHENOMENA OF SPIRITUALISM.

I have mentioned the name of Miss Showers in connection with that of Miss Florence Cook. The first-named lady was for a considerable period prominently before the public as a private medium, who generously consented to the publication of particulars respecting the séances at which some remarkable evidence of materialization was given. Tests of a nature similar to those already described were given, and in many ways the manifestations of psychical power which were seen in the presence of Miss Showers were akin to those shown through the mediumship of Miss Florence Cook. Mr. G. R. Tapp, for example, in recording a séance held at Mr. Luxmore's, Miss Showers being the medium, gives the following testimony:—

"Florence, raising the curtain, asked me to go inside and look at her medium, at the same time directing me to hold up the curtain to let in the light. I did so, and stood before Miss Showers, who was lying back entranced in her easy chair, in her black dress with the white lace round the sleeves and throat. Florence in her white robes stood close to my left hand, in the full light from the outer room, that came in as I stood with the curtain raised in my right hand. I carefully looked at the medium and Florence, and satisfied myself beyond a doubt as to their separate identity. After scrutinising both for about five minutes, Florence took my left arm with her right hand, and mixing with her left hand the left arm of Miss Showers from her lap, touched my hand against that of the medium and held them together for about six seconds. The medium then gave a slight start, and moved. The form then came out into the room and remained a long time playing, talking, sitting," &c.

At the same place on another occasion,† the following test was obtained:—

"The spirit 'Florence,' standing in her flowing white robes, in a good light in front of the curtain, directed one of the sitters to take the hand-lamp from the table and follow her at once into the dark room used as a cabinet. This was done, but Florence had vanished. Only the medium in her black silk dress, lying entranced in her chair, was to be seen. After carefully examining the room, the gentleman resumed his seat outside, and again Florence came out in her white robes, asking him to repeat the experiment more quickly. He did so, but Florence had disappeared, the medium being found entranced as before. Another sitter was then allowed to do the same, with a like result."

* Spiritualist, April 10th, 1874.

† Spiritualist, April 17th, 1874.

* Spiritualist, April 3rd, 1874.

I quote here a careful account of a private séance at the house of Mrs. Makdougall Gregory, 21, Green-street, W., which I published at the time.*

"Let me premise that a cabinet was made by partitioning off the back drawing-room with a thin frame-work covered with ordinary wall paper. In this frame-work was a door, and an aperture at which the spirit face usually appears. Within the cabinet was a piano, a sofa, and some chairs. There was no means of egress from the room except by means of the door which led into the front drawing-room, in which we sat. I will not dwell on what took place before the medium went into the cabinet. As soon as she entered, she herself, or the spirit 'Peter,' rather, speaking through her, proposed to Mrs. Gregory that a search for any concealed drapery should be made. This was declined. Those who know most of the delicate conditions which usually accompany these manifestations will not consider that they would be likely to be improved by subjecting a lady to the indignity of being searched for the discovery of her implements of deception. Nor was it deemed advisable to tie her to the leg of a piano as, I am sorry to say, was once before done. We considered that such mode of testing was neither decent nor profitable. She was simply placed on a chair in the most distant corner of the room, and I left her sitting there with a black silk dress on, her hair loosely flowing over her shoulders. After the usual painful attempts at singing, which is the inevitable punishment in these cases, I heard the voice of the spirit, 'Florence Maples,' speaking within the partition near the door. My chair was within two feet of the door throughout the evening. The room having been partially darkened, I opened the door, and saw in the dim light a form clad from head to foot in white. By degrees it floated rather than stepped through the door into the room in which we sat. The projecting framework over which she passed seemed no impediment, though it was six or eight inches from the floor, and was somewhat awkward to step over. The figure was now so close to me that I could touch it with ease. It remained within my reach for an hour and a-half, during which time I scrutinised it with great care, and observed some very curious facts. Moreover, all the fourteen sitters came, saw, and touched it. It sat down in a chair, which I handed to it, and otherwise comported itself as 'one of us.'"

"Now for the points to which I wish to advert:—

"1. The medium entered the cabinet in a black silk dress, with long, flowing hair, and with high-heeled boots on her feet. The figure of Florence emerged from the cabinet with a head encircled with drapery, and with a long net veil that covered her shoulders and descended to her waist. The upper part of the body was covered by some very soft material, of wool, apparently; the lower part by a linen garment which trailed on the floor. After the séance the medium was found on the floor flat on her face, close to the chair on which I left her. The long hair was undisturbed; the silk dress, the boots, were there, and no appearance of disorder could be detected. Will your lady readers say whether they conceive it possible that such alterations of dress could have been made in the dark by the most skilful actress; or whether such a change, involving the pulling off and on of a silk dress, could have escaped a sharp ear planted close to the partition? Probably the question answers itself."

"2. I noticed that the figure of 'Florence' seemed taller than that of the medium as it stood in the doorway. I, therefore, asked it to stand by my side. It did so, and the height was carefully observed. After the séance, I requested the medium to stand in the same position, and a difference of not less than four inches was found to exist between her and 'Florence.'"

"3. When the figure first emerged from the cabinet, I asked it to shake hands with me. A cold, clammy claw rather than hand, was stiffly jerked from the side, as though a string had been pulled. I touched it, and found it to be unnaturally formed, cold to the touch and unlike human flesh. I took several opportunities of touching the hand during the evening, and I found it gradually acquired vital heat, lost its abnormal shape and feel, and became like a human hand but always larger and longer than the medium's. When once it had got shape and warmth it retained it through the evening.

"4. Although the hands and arms were naturally formed and the body correctly shaped, the face never assumed a natural look, and during a part at least of the evening I believe that feet were wanting. I passed my foot under the figure, which seemed to be off the floor, and found no obstacle. I believe that no feet were there. The face presented throughout the evening a completely abnormal appearance. The complexion was pasty, and like bad wax-work; the lips compressed so as to give an appearance of pain; and the glassy eyes, with their perpetual stare, gave the face a most unnatural look. I tried all in my power to make the eyes blink, but in vain. The whites were unnaturally large, and no eyelids were perceptible. The face was unhuman throughout the night, though at other times I have seen it look natural and pretty.

"5. I felt the breath from the mouth, and I saw the chest rise and fall as breath was drawn. Moreover, as the figure stood touching me, by my side, I could feel the beating of the heart. There was apparently a fully-organised body.

"6. I handed the figure my chair and asked it to sit down, not very long after it first appeared. The process of sitting down was most peculiar. I apologise for my expression, but I can find no other. It simply doubled up, as though some one had touched a spring which caused it to bend. The legs were bundled under in some way, and the whole process was as unlike a lady taking a seat as can be imagined. At a later period of the evening the process was easy, graceful, and natural.

"7. During the whole evening the figure was in immediate contiguity to me. I could touch it at will. I was frequently between it and the cabinet. I could have gone through the door into the cabinet, or have grasped the figure at will. This scarcely savours of a tricking spirit, I fancy. Such would have been careful that it should not be at the mercy of any curious investigator, especially one who had shown such prying curiosity as I had. I do not propose to offer any theory to account for the fact which I have recorded. I have none, and I must see much before I care to frame one. This form certainly stood more handling, inspecting, and probing than any I ever saw. Indeed, that a young medium, who scarcely knew anyone in a room filled with fourteen people, should have been able to evoke such a manifestation, argues the possession of medial powers of a very rare order. The figure seemed quite reluctant to go, and departed apparently in better condition than when it first appeared.

"I have already said that I applied my ear to the thin paper which alone separated us from the cabinet after the séance was over; and it only remains for me to record my conviction, as a further test, that no movement of the medium in the cabinet could have escaped me. I heard no sound whatever. Complete stillness prevailed in the cabinet; and I entertain no doubt that the medium was lying, as we afterwards found her, deeply entranced on the floor."

If modern Christendom had not been under the domination of a theology that was autocratic and wholly discordant with the teachings of Jesus, it would have welcomed the modern Spiritualism. Its demonstrations were just what were wanted to convince the world of the truth of a religion that taught, while it could not prove, the continuance of life after the dissolution of the body.—Golden Gate.

SECTARIANISM RENOUNCED.—Rev. M. M. Mangasarian, pastor of the Spring Garden Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, publicly renounced, last October, the dogmas of Calvin, to an enthusiastic audience. In the course of his address he said, "I stand on tip-toe and shout at the top of my voice that henceforth I am no longer a sectarian preacher, or the slave of a medieval creed." "I have escaped from my fetters, leapt the fence. I have now the wide world to build upon and immensity to build into, the church of goodness and love." "I have hitherto been fenced in, and whenever I proposed to investigate in any particular direction, I might go as far as my fence allowed and then had to turn back. Was I seen to look over the fence I was suspected of heresy, and bade not to do it again. But now, how glad I am that I have attained to the liberty of thought and speech. My pulpit hereafter will be an honest one, and I shall fly as far as my wings can carry me," &c.—Pelagio-Philosophical Journal.

Spirit Identity.

SIR,—In this month's number of the Fortnightly Review there is an article entitled "The Evidences of Spiritualism," by F. H. Bradley, written against Spiritualism, which I wish very much some competent writer among ourselves would meet and answer. Such an undertaking is utterly beyond my powers, but there are one or two points on which I would like to make a few remarks, as, though a Spiritualist of only short standing (some eighteen months), I have read and thought a great deal about the matter; besides having some little practical experience. Mr. Bradley approaches the subject in a fair and candid spirit, and commences by acknowledging the facts and phenomena, though he denies the Spiritual hypothesis, or rather the fact that the manifestations are due to those from whom they purport to come, namely, the spirits of our friends and relations. He likewise denies that such manifestations in any way prove the immortality of the soul or the fact of an individual existence after death. The points in his essay, however, on which I want briefly to touch are the materiality of the spirit body and the question of spirit identity, of both of which subjects I have some little knowledge. I possess the advantage of having received a large number of letters or communications in direct writing from a dear friend who has passed away; and as corroborative proof that this correspondent is really the friend he asserts himself to be, I have not only the evidence of his own handwriting, in letters written during séances with a well-known medium, but communications received through my own powers in the solitude of my room, as well as when sitting occasionally with a friend at her residence; all the communications agreeing and corresponding with one another. I sometimes wish I were permitted to make public some of the messages I receive, which throw a little light on the extremely difficult question of the means by which spirits are able to communicate with us, and which my friend tells me is to some extent yet in great measure a mystery to himself; "spiritual chemistry," as he calls it, being most difficult for him to explain, or even to comprehend himself. One sentence I think I may be permitted to quote. It is this: "You quite understand the difference between the physical and spiritual? When I am able to cloak myself with the physical aura emanating from you, I am then physicalised and able to give you signs of my presence. At other times I can only hover near you in loving guardianship." This seems to me very clearly expressed. I have no doubt myself that spirits, when in their own sphere, have organised and material bodies, suitable to the atmosphere and conditions in which they exist, but that they cannot bring these material spiritual bodies with them to our sphere, when they wish to communicate with us, and therefore have to borrow such amount of materiality as may be necessary for the purpose of manifesting from those who are called mediums. Being slightly endowed with what is called mediumistic power myself, I feel a certain amount of vitality being taken from me when the communications I refer to take place while sitting alone; the same feeling is less apparent when I am sitting with others, as they then contribute some share of this force, which our spirit friends collect in order to be able to manifest their presence. Mr. Bradley says the "'spiritual body' is a foolish imagination." I do not conceive that the "spiritual body" returns to this earth, but that the spirit is clothed for the time in attributes borrowed from others necessary to manifest his presence. The difficulty of so manifesting in borrowed temporary garb, and in some degree through the mental as well as the physical powers of mortal beings, can be only faintly imagined, and may explain to a certain extent many incomplete and unsatisfactory manifestations. The only comparison that occurs to me as at all adequate is that of the diver in his cumbersome and unwieldy apparatus, by means of which he is alone able to overcome the difficulty of existing or performing his task in a strange element. One would be surprised if, so encumbered, he could act with the easiness, freedom, and dexterity of which he is capable on dry land, and if, moreover, the air supplied to him is scanty or impure we could scarcely wonder if his task were accomplished in a slovenly or incomplete manner.

I cannot make out clearly to what Mr. Bradley attributes the manifestations which he does not deny; he probably leaves this for the present an open question, but he seems to admit the possibility of their being due to some lower and grosser order of spirits. This is not a new idea, but whenever it is presented to my notice, I am always struck with wonder as to what can be imagined to be the motive which actuates these beings to perpetrate and carry on a system of deception lasting sometimes for years, by personating the relations and friends with whom we believe we hold communion. If it be for our confusion here and the ruin of our souls hereafter, surely it is a most curious and unaccountable method to adopt. To make our lives better and purer, bright with the hope of a glorious immortality and reunion with the friends we love, is a work worthy of angels, rather than of demons or elementary spirits. I will only speak in this matter of my own experience—the letters I receive are permeated with the purest and best sentiments, with a compassionate love and pity for those on earth, whose eyes are as yet blinded to the great truth of immortality, and for those who long in vain for some sign from their beloved dead; urging me to help them to attain this knowledge to the best of my ability, and above all, with gratitude and adoration of "The Almighty Father, the Great Supreme." There is one paragraph of Mr. Bradley's essay which I will quote, for I think it shadows forth a hope that he, too, may one day see the light. "Against the religion of the Spiritualist, if we take it at its best, against his conception, that is, of the true aim of the soul and of its duty towards God, I have nothing to say. He stands far above the level of orthodox Christianity, and if I thought that this article would weaken his persuasion, that would cause me regret." Surely the counsels, communications, and teachings which lead to such a result as this cannot be derived from an inferior race of spirits!

As to the possibility of establishing spirit identity, Mr. Bradley utterly denies this. Everyone knows how difficult a matter it is to prove the identity of a person who, for instance, has long been absent from his country and cut off from all communication with those who ever knew him, especially if his personal appearance is altered beyond all recognition. In the case of our spirit friends, there are even greater difficulties to overcome, for they are invisible, and the evidence of the likeness cannot be brought forward, except in rare cases of materialisation; but there are many ways in which they can and do prove their identity without the shadow of a doubt. I conclude Mr. Bradley has had few, if any, opportunities of being present at those private or family circles at which proofs of the identity of the spirits communicating are so frequently and repeatedly given. I will confine myself to my own very limited experience in this line, and say that when sitting with the lady friend I before mentioned, we always get messages through my guide, which could not by any possibility be given by any other intelligence than the one from whom they purport to come. On two occasions they were to my friend, being private matters utterly unknown to either my guide or myself, of trivial import if you will, but of immense value as an undeniable proof of identity. Such instances occur in family and harmonious circles by hundreds, but naturally they are not made public. As regards my correspondence with my spirit friend, besides the familiar handwriting and signature there are many little unmistakable signs, proving that it is really he himself who is writing, and no other.

Though his native language is German, he always wrote to me in earth-life, and does so still, in very correct English. He wrote on one occasion that he found it easier to write in English, and I presume that this is because the medium from whom he gets the power to write these letters in direct writing, is English. Sometimes, however, there is a little foreign turn to a sentence, or even a slight error in the spelling, and this I notice occurs when the power is weaker than usual. On one occasion only, about a year ago, I received a letter from him written most beautifully in German; and the next time I sat he explained it thus: "I wrote in German on the last occasion because by some singular freak of the power which guides and directs me, I was stronger in my language than in English." This shows, I think, how mysterious and how imperfectly understood this method of communion is, even to those who are able to avail themselves of it.

The argument that because the writings and performances of spirits at their best are inferior to those of human beings, therefore such spirits must belong to an inferior race, seems to me very weak. No doubt in their own sphere, unfettered and free, they are much more powerful and exact than we poor mortals, but if we think of the almost insuperable difficulties they have to overcome before they can give the smallest proof of their presence, and the poor instruments they frequently have to work with, the writing by direct means of only one word or one little message given by the tedious process of raps or tilts, becomes a stupendous manifestation. Many, however, of the spirit-teachings or communications made public are anything rather than inferior to those of ordinary mortals in style or manner, while in matter they are as the light from heaven compared to that of gas lamps. The style of such communications is, however, to a certain extent dependent on the instrument through whom they come, and the most highly intellectual spirit finds it impossible to express his thoughts or views with much clearness through an uneducated medium—this is a mystery, but it is likewise a fact. For my own part I am overcome with wonder and gratitude at the trouble they take, and the patience they show, watching so carefully for the power to be strong enough to allow them to give some manifestation, showing they are in our midst and still able to give us proofs of their undying love and interest in our welfare.—I am, dear Sir, yours faithfully, V.

Spiritism versus Other Theories.

SIR,—According to Von Hartmann's speculations, all the physical phenomena are produced by the medium, who, for the purpose of obtaining the required results, places himself in a certain condition called masked or manifest somnambulism. Whilst the author confesses to an absence of personal experience of the subject—never having, upon his own admission, attended a séance—he seems, on the other hand, to be well acquainted with other strange physiological facts; therefore, we cannot wonder at his reluctance to attribute these mysterious séance-room occurrences to the agency of disembodied human spirits. But although the author has taken great pains to keep out spirits altogether, he has unconsciously allowed them to slip in, at least on one occasion.

On page 31 of the English translation he says: "In some very extraordinary phenomena, e.g., the penetration of the medium's arm by an iron ring, it is reported that the medium's hands become as cold as those of a corpse laid upon ice." Further on, p. 41, the author records the various experiments (relating to the penetration of matter) of Reimers, Aksakow, Olcott, Zellner, and other competent observers. Here, however, he does not consider the facts as "very extraordinary," but as a "specially improbable class of phenomena," and concludes with the remark, "it is generally accepted among Spiritualists that a medium in the somnambulant state is able, by the penetration of matter, to get free from and to resume every sort of fastening." One might be permitted to ask whether Von Hartmann does or does not admit the passage of solids through solids. He certainly does not state so definitely, and much depends upon this. But I beg to remind the author that Spiritualists do not generally accept the theory that a ring helps itself upon the medium's arm; but that, on the contrary, Spiritualists who have made the experiment in question, possess sufficient evidence to confirm their belief—if not to absolutely prove—that the disintegration of matter and the fixing of a welded iron ring on the medium's wrist, is the work of disembodied human spirits.

As to Von Hartmann's remark, p. 31, it must appear to the reader that he really admits this very extraordinary phenomenon since he uses it in support of preceding statements that, "as a constantly recurring observation, the hands of the medium, which by means of still uninvestigated nerve forces, produce, &c., are as cold as those of a corpse laid upon ice" (cold as ice would have done well enough). Yet my personal experience with Husk does not correspond with Von Hartmann's assertion. I find his hands disagreeably hot, and dripping with perspiration during similar manifestations.

But to return to the more important point in question. To admit the possibility of a welded iron ring penetrating the medium's arm, we must assume that either the former or the latter is submitted to some unknown process—say that of disintegration. In such case some intelligent being (not the medium, for his hands are secured) is required—postulated—to conduct the operation or to induce the action of forces necessary for the production of such manifestation.

The mere proposition that the somnambulant trance condition of the medium performs it all is, in the face of direct experiment, an absurdity. Or, does the author mean that the ring jumps, by magnetic attraction or by some uninvestigated nerve force, through the medium's wrist? If the author does not mean that, he would oblige an inquiring world by stating by whom and how the ring is placed on the arm of a person whose hands are firmly held. He should also bear in mind (1) that it is the experience of those who have taken the trouble to investigate the subject personally, that the ring or rings are put on the medium's arm after consultation with audible and often tangible beings, which, judging from their movements and localisation in the séance room, cannot be either the medium or any other mortal present. (2) That the experiment is performed upon and not by the medium; and, lastly, that his hypothesis of somnambulant trances powers over solids will not cover the fact of the rings (which are too small to pass over the hand) falling off again after the séance, when the medium has resumed his waking, conscious state. If Dr. von Hartmann would attend a series of séances with a good physical medium, he might arrive at conclusions more rational than those in which the present brochure abounds.

J. G. KEULEMANS.

Von Hartmann.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I must crave a small space for some remarks relative to Von Hartmann. He is a great advocate for "critical circumspection," a phrase which he uses more than once. Is it quite consistent with this wise precaution that he has not himself attended a single séance, though attendance "at a hundred séances at least" would be advisable before hazarding a judgment?

Now the first principle of "critical circumspection" would be not to write on a practical subject of which you have no knowledge and no experience. What would be thought of a "Treatise on Horsemanship," the author of which avowed in limine that he had never once mounted a horse? Our philosopher chose rather to evolve his conclusions out of the depths of his own consciousness, or, for aught I know, out of the depths of his own "unconsciousness,"—for the "unconscious" plays a great part in the author's system, as we shall presently see. I suggested a motive for his non-attendance, which showed prudence but no chivalry, and "C. C. M." indignantly rejects the imputation. May I ask him, then, what he conceives the motive to have been? for assuredly any one's first impulse would be to witness the alleged phenomena—if he thought the subject worthy of serious consideration, much more if he intended to write upon it. If the motive was prudential, then I maintain that it was "ignoble." I have suggested the wrong motive, perhaps "C. C. M." will tell us what was the right one. He excuses his friend on the ground that he "would not be responsible for individual cases." All right if they were cases which he had not witnessed, but as I maintain "cowardly" if they were cases which he had witnessed, or might have witnessed, but would not. The same reason which prevented him from witnessing, ought also to have prevented him from writing on the subject. And there I leave it.

I am also blamed for calling a pessimist "low-thoughted." In one word what is "Pessimism"? It is to despair of the universe. It is the negation of all hope, and hope is the divinest principle in man—both an instinct and a prophecy. Despair, on the other hand, is base and craven. Cicero nobly and confidently says, "Magni est animi semper sperare." What did the old Romans think of it? When the Consuls of the year received the tremendous tidings of Cannæ, they instantly sold the ground where the battle was fought, and on which the enemy was encamped, not doubting for a moment of its speedy redemption. These Consuls were decreed the highest honours because they had not "despaired of the Republic." But what terms of ignominy do those deserve who despair, not of a race, a kingdom or a country, but who despair of the universe itself! What shall we say of those who, born into this glorious universe, so full of promise and foregleams of Paradise, yet regard it as an execrable fact, of which no account can be given, and of which we can only hope that it will one day be dissolved and fall back into the nothingness from which it arose?

These are not my terms, they are the words of Schopenhauer, and echoed by his followers, Von Hartmann and Co. No terms of disdain are excessive for such a base posture of the soul. It is the negation of all that gives dignity to human nature and meaning to existence.

"C. C. M." quite agrees with what I say about "transferred hallucinations," but resents my calling Von Hartmann's explanation of it a "jargon." Still, if it explains nothing, and gives us merely high-sounding phrases instead, how can it be anything else than "a jargon."

I am afraid the same verdict must be passed on his doctrine of "The Unconscious." He treats of "The Metaphysics of the Unconscious." He regards "The Unconscious" as the all-pervading power and substance of Being. It is "an organising Unconscious." The whole process of organic evolution is represented as being designed by the Unconscious. It is eminently teleological. Here is a conundrum which the author does not resolve. The Unconscious moves from within in virtue of an immanent, indwelling teleological aim. Nature or matter has an "end" and "aim" of which it is all unconscious, being itself without intelligence or design. Such, then, is the Unconscious.

We may well ask, how can such contradictions be accepted as a philosophy which accounts for the universe? It is, indeed, amazing. But those who are already atheists and materialists have a craving for something which, by the aid of abstractions, looks like a philosophy, or can be made to do duty for it. They are not very critical, provided the conclusion they desire is arrived at. And that conclusion is Pessimism—an end worthy of the beginning. On its forehead is written "Despair." It turns from the light, and hails the approach of eternal darkness. It says with Satan in "Paradise Lost," "Sun, how I hate thy beams!" or "Curse God and die." The Unconscious is scarcely worth cursing. Such is the Satanic message which Pessimism sends to mankind. And yet I am accused of speaking too harshly of it! It is a thing to be treated only with loathing and disdain.

And now a word about Slade. I trusted too much to my memory. It appears that his sentence to three months' imprisonment with hard labour was quashed on appeal, for a formal error in the conviction, as returned to the court. He thus escaped on a technical point. This fact does not in the least lessen Zollner's magnanimity in receiving him at Leipzig and assisting at his séances.

G. D. HAUGHTON.

Divination by Numbers.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Your correspondent "C. C. M." in his interesting communication, takes exception to the title of my letter, "Numbers as a Means of Spirit Telegraphy," because, as he says, my experience was "a fact which, according to the temporal order of things" (the italics are my own), "could not be directly influenced by spirit interference." According to the temporal order of things, no doubt my explanation is wrong; but I hold that in this, as in all matters in which spirit is concerned, we have not to do with this same temporal order of things.

A mighty angel was heard by the apocalyptic seer to announce that "time should be no longer," and in this announcement we have possibly, even probably, when stripped of its gorgeous surroundings, the simple assertion of a change of condition which would make the terms past, present, and future meaningless.

Much has been said and speculated as to space of four dimensions, or, properly speaking, as to a four-dimensional condition, but little has been hazarded as to the possibility of a state of things in which what, for want of a better name, I must call two-dimensional time existed.

Such a condition would bear to our present one-dimensional time a relation similar to that which two-dimensional, or superficial, space bears to one-dimensional or line-space.

Let us, then, endeavour to conceive what an intelligent being might see and do under such circumstances of two-dimensional time, and how much another intelligent being co-existent with, but constrained to live in one-dimensional time, would be able to understand of the action of the former. On a plane surface, if I draw a line, I can take in that line two points, A and B, the sequence from left to right being in the order of the alphabet; but I can also interchange these points so that the sequence shall be contrary to the order of the alphabet. Now, if an intelligent agent, travelling along this line and living only in this line, met A and then met B, B would be to him a consequence of A in the first case; if he first met B and then A, A would be a consequence of B in the second case, and as his knowledge would only be that of a sequence of points, he could not know how I had, in two or more dimensions, altered the sequences.

So in the case narrated in my letter, an intelligent being existent in four or more dimensional space, with a two or more dimensional time at his command, might have arranged the numbers at the Musée Plantin so as to fulfil my wish for the number 107, and because I could not see more than one point at once along the line of one-dimensional time, the arrangement made by this intelligent being would be my temporal order of things.

The Phenomenality of the Subject.

SIR,—If I have confined myself, as Mr. Gurney says, "to a single branch of percipience—the percipience of an external world"—that is because he himself especially selected that branch of percipience for an attack on my position. If there can be no agreement between us as to the necessary condition of percipience under the form of space, it is useless to carry the controversy into hypothetical worlds of non-spatial objectivity. My way is effectually blocked by Mr. Gurney's denial of the necessity of a local filling at the percipient point of observation in a world of spatial perception.

I certainly thought at one time that Mr. Gurney was wavering as to the conceivable sufficiency of the mathematical point for spatial percipience. As my argument to the contrary depends entirely on the essential character of all spatial externality, and the relation this involves to a self-representation, I do not see how it can be affected by the supposition that "externality" and "spatial relations" might have a meaning rather different from their present ones. I cannot give this supposition a sense which would make it at all relevant to the issue. But it is clear that Mr. Gurney does adhere to the mathematical point (though he still speaks of it as possibly "in a sense an object to the percipient," which I cannot understand how a mathematical point could possibly be). And so I am afraid we must agree to differ. For I can only repeat that it is a representation of myself that has to be placed at the point of observation, not the mere unity of apperception, a representation of myself as at that point, and that such a local representation is necessarily, as I conceive, a local filling. Mr. Gurney does not recognise that necessity. I believe he does not recognise it because he does not lay stress, as I do, on the word representation, which, referred to space, is extended object. Subject and object must be distinguished in consciousness. Now it is true that I can represent the subject—or determine it—under the fundamental form of time only, but for a local representation the form of space, which is not the mathematical abstraction of a point, is essential. If we cannot agree upon this, it is useless to discuss the further question, how the extended subject-object must also be conceived as organism. Given the subjective construction of a world of space out of the feelings in a consciousness, the first object thus constructed will be—I contend necessarily—that which can be afterwards represented as the condition of all the rest. And I find in the actual connection between my body as percept and my body as condition of perception (organism), the general relation which can be indicated a priori as the condition of percipience in space.

One word more as to the homogeneity of the subject-object with the objective world to which it belongs. This does not mean for me that a self is represented to correspond with each particular kind of sensation. I have not to represent myself as a colour or a sound, a taste or an odour, because I have these several sensations. It is the objective world—spatial or non-spatial as the case may be—to which my sensation refers me (or to which I refer my sensation), not the particular sensation itself, with which I say the subject-object must be homogeneous. The conformity which I postulate is simply that of extension in a world of space, and of the correspondingly general mode of representation, whatever that may be, in a world of percepts not implying space at all. Given a world in which the sole mode of percipience, the sole experience or consciousness, is of ideal harmony—the only sense in which I can conceive music without sound implying spatial externality.—I have still to relate a musical not-me to a me, since that is the indispensable condition of consciousness. But the me must be represented in consciousness, and such representation must be cognate to (or homogeneous with) my experience, since it is entirely derived therefrom, unless (contrary to the hypothesis) an a priori content is supposed. So that the "inherent absurdity" of a tunc-me would seem to follow from the hypothesis of a world of tune and nothing else. I confess I do not myself see any more absurdity in self-representation, or representation to others, as a harmony, than as coloured extension of a certain form. If there is any absurdity, it is in the hypothesis (of a world thus limited), not in the consequence. But directly we admit other modes of percipience, we have a more general basis of objectivity, and therefore of objective self-representation, just as extension is such a basis of our existing world, and self-positioning therein.

"Is Man Redeveloping a Latent Sense?"

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—In H. E. Starrett's interesting article in your issue of December 5th, there is so much to admire and sympathise with, that I feel a reticence in saying anything to detract in any way from its value. Still I think it should be shown that it springs from an entirely mistaken foundation—and the change of heading I have adopted above, ("Is Man Developing a Sixth Sense?") will tend to elucidate this.

For has not this sense been given to man from the earliest times?

See the Bible testimonies from Genesis to the Revelation!
See the Delphic Oracles!
See the ancestral worship among savage nations!
See the accounts of the so-called supernatural in all countries, and in all ages!

No! This sixth sense is in no way a new sense, but a sense acknowledged as being co-existent with our creation in the Mosaic records.

It has simply been lost to view through the more worldly senses gaining such ascendancy over the mind of man, as to drown for a time the finer and more spiritual sense.

But that sense has always been part of the soul, although, like a vein of pure gold, so deep in the bowels of the earth as to lie undiscovered, and this, our greatest and purest treasure, has lain hidden in the recesses of the soul, both individual and national; only of late years to be disinterred and redeveloped through the reaction on our nature of a wave of spiritual enlightenment, that seems to be gradually permeating, not only the individual and national, but the universal soul of our planet.

Should you consider these few lines to be in the right direction, may I ask you kindly to allow them space in your next issue?—I am, sir, faithfully yours,

December 5th, 1885.

Mr. Eglington and Materialisation Séances.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—To save me from much useless correspondence, I am compelled to trouble you to give insertion to the request which I again wish to make with reference to séances for materialisation. Scarcely a day passes without my receiving one or more applications to give séances for such manifestations, although it is now a very well-known fact that I am unable to comply, for the reason that the persons making such requests are either unprepared by previous experiences for demonstrations of the kind, or are totally ignorant of the subject; and for the more important reason that the strain of such séances is so great a tax upon my health that my more important work in psychography is quite stopped for the time being. As I consider that phase of mediumship by far the most valuable, I think I am well advised in maintaining my strength, that this successful work may not be impaired in the least; and I therefore trust this statement of my position will be a sufficient explanation as to why I am compelled in every instance to refuse applications for materialisation séances.—Yours truly,

THE Journal de Liège is publishing, in a series, many of the strange facts observed and recorded by persons of position in India, including M. Jacollet, the judge of Chandernagor. Who could have foreseen that the Journal de Liège, so long and persistently the opponent of magnetism and Spiritualism, should at last have become a disseminator of facts still held to be impossible by our universities? Well, changes come with time.

THE UTILISATION OF PRIVATE CIRCLES.

We have already shown how the plan of Research now in operation will benefit the medium who devotes his psychical powers to the service of the public, too often with evil results to himself. The gradual dissipation of ignorance must benefit him by the development of better conditions of investigation. The graduation of circles will remove one of the greatest difficulties under which he laboured. The exclusion of persons, for one or more of many reasons unfitted for a place in any circle, will be to him an unmixed benefit. Acquaintance with the best conditions of inquiry and research will prevent him from being placed in positions equivocal, hurtful, and conducive to misconception and error.

But the public medium is not the only, though he is the best known, channel of communication with the world of spirit. It would be a revelation to our readers if it were possible to give some account of the private circles that are held regularly and systematically throughout this kingdom, and of the results obtained in them. They are occupied usually with the higher aspects of Spiritualism, often with its more distinctively religious phases, or with intimate and sacred communion with friends who have gone before into the world of spirit. Most frequently they are secure from intrusion and change, and experience has taught the best conditions for the results desired. These are not such as the frequenter of a public circle seeks, and are, indeed, wholly apart from what he is likely to obtain. A permanent circle into which no fresh element is allowed to penetrate is likely, as very rudimentary experience teaches, to secure results that a promiscuous assemblage of incoherent and often inharmonious elements is not at all likely to achieve.

It does not seem to be sufficiently apprehended that a circle composed of a dozen persons seated round a table, or in a horseshoe form, obtains objective manifestations only after an intimate blending of the psychical elements of which it is composed. If there be in any part of it a person whose psychical impenetrability is proof against this intimate interblending of the subtle aura that surrounds each of us, the results are so far interfered with, and possibly stopped. A promiscuous circle, collected at haphazard, affords, therefore, a precarious field for investigation on other grounds than those of the impossibility of reckoning with its unknown elements and eliminating possible conditions of fraud. That such remarkable results are so often secured is due chiefly to the more complete development of the medium, and to his indifference from long practice to conditions which would paralyse a less hardened psychic.

In a private circle the line of resistance is less marked. The elements of which the circle is composed are usually more intimately fused, are more harmonious in themselves, and more at one in their intents and desires. They are on a far higher plane of elevation, and the emotional, often the religious element is present in a marked degree. The medium is surrounded by congenial influence, is at ease and readily open to access from spirits who are on intimate terms with the whole circle. He is cared for with a wise and tender care, and his sensitive nature is not wounded by rude and foolish tests, falsely so-called. The evidence of spirit-communication is too clear to the spirits of those who seek it thus—for spiritual things are and must be spiritually discerned—to make it necessary for them to impose harassing and often impossible restrictions on the friends who return to them. They have learned enough to know that such a method of material test produces inevitably, and by a natural law, results of an order that they do not wish for; results confined to a lower plane; one, unquestionably, more suited to the plane of development occupied by those who devise and employ it.

In such circles exceptional results are obtained under exceptionally perfect conditions. The medium approaches an ideal condition of harmonious development, and the circle is freed from the grosser elements that so paralyse results in promiscuous circles; or, still worse, that invite and attract influences of the earth, earthy, or even lower still. The records of such circles, if any be kept at all systematically, are not of a nature that can be made public. The animating principle is one that is sacred, and thus the highest, purest, most impressive phase of Spiritualism is one almost unknown to, and altogether unappreciated by, the outside world. They take their idea of Spiritualism from the police-court, from the average magazine article, from the buffooneries of a promiscuous circle, from the meanest representation and the coarsest parody of that which is holy, pure, and ennobling to a degree that they cannot even imagine. It is not too much to say that when we speak, from this intimate experience, of Spiritualism we mean something as far removed from the vulgar conception of that much misused term as the pellucid purity of an Italian sky is from the murky gloom of a November fog in London.

Such circles we are aware must be holy ground on which no intrusion can be permitted. But there are others, held under conditions hardly less favourable, where unimpeachable results are got, and where the communications are not of that intimately personal nature that shuts them off wholly from publicity. To these it is hoped that some access may be obtained under the plan of research with which we have been now for some weeks concerned. Some, it may be, can give to the Central Committee of Control, who alone are responsible for publishing records of fact which may be useful and valuable. Some may even be able to admit properly certified persons to witness some of the more elementary phenomena, or to listen to some teaching from the world of spirit. It will be part of the work of the Central Committee to seek for duly qualified persons, for whom they will bear testimony, access to the acquaintance of experienced Spiritualists at home and abroad. By this means an intimate bond of union will be kept up, and the results of inestimable value collected in private circles will, it is hoped, be to some extent utilised.

The average investigator is shut out from this sphere of observation, almost necessarily by the nature of the circle, and finally by his incapacity to appreciate the evidence with which he has to deal. If there were ever any chance that the evidence of which we speak might at any time be made public, and submitted to a scrutiny that is often ignorant, and more often impertinent, that chance has been lost by an almost inconceivable folly. It remains for the Experimental Section of the London Spiritualist Alliance to approach this mass of evidence from the side of sympathy and experience.

A REMARKABLE MATERIALISATION SEANCE.

On Tuesday evening, August 15th, 1876, I, by invitation, attended a séance at a private residence in Newcastle-on-Tyne.

The hour appointed for the séance was eight o'clock. I reached the house at 7.56, and found the company assembled in an ordinary sitting-room which was on the first floor, was plainly furnished, and about 12ft. or 14ft. above the level of the street.

The room is 14ft. by 11ft., and is entered by one door in the corner of the room; the window at the other end faces the main street. One corner or recess of the room is formed by the front wall and gable end of the house, and was screened off by a dark curtain suspended from an iron rod; the window was entirely closed by deal boarding; the door or entrance to the room was closed and locked and hasped from the inside, so that there was no access to, nor egress from the room.

Across the window and close to it an ordinary double-ended sofa was placed, and the medium, Mrs. P., a lady about forty years of age, stout and matronly, reclined on the sofa with her feet towards the curtained corner of the room, and her head at the other end of the sofa resting on a pillow. The company sat in the quadrant of a circle in the following order, and extended entirely from the end of the sofa on which the medium lay round the two sides of the room close to the walls, thus preventing the possibility of either ingress or egress through the circle of the sitters. The sitters were in the following order:—Mr. W. P. next the sofa, Mrs. H., Mr. L., Mr. H., Mr. Barkas, Mrs. M., Mr. M., Mr. F., and Mr. P.

During the whole time of the séance a lamp was burning, and during the greater part of the time it burned so brightly that I could see with distinctness the features of all who were sitting in the room, and the medium reclining on the sofa.

That the medium reclining on the sofa was visible during the whole séance to all present there is not the least doubt.

The séance was commenced at eight o'clock promptly. A suitable hymn was sung, and a short and earnest prayer offered, after which the musical box played, and we sat in silence. After sitting for about twelve minutes the curtains screening the recess began to move, and a tall, white form presented itself; the partial presentation took place five or six times at intervals of about one minute, and finally a tall, female form emerged from behind the curtain; she was draped in brilliant white raiment, which covered her, in the fashion of the young girls of ancient Greece, resembling the garb worn by Galatea in the modern drama of Pygmalion and Galatea. Over her head and face there was a thin, almost perfectly transparent gauze veil; on her shoulders was a cape or cover, which descended a little below her waist; she was clothed from neck to feet in a loosely-fitting white garment; her bust, which was small and slightly developed, was loosely covered by her cape and dress; and her body and lower extremities were well covered by moderately ample skirts. When she raised her arms, which she frequently did, the cape fell from them, and left exposed slender arms naked to the shoulder. She was, as I have said, slender, elegant, and sylph-like, and the medium, who visibly lay on the sofa, was a stout and very fully-developed matron.

The figure was the bien-ideal of a lovely girl in the first flush of womanhood. She moved about the room freely, gracefully, and modestly, with all the air and grace of a girl accustomed to the habits of good society.

The figure, on first emerging from the recess, walked timidly into the centre of the room and looked modestly round on the circle of sitters. She approached Mr. J. P., and after shaking hands with him she went to Mrs. H., who presented her with a bouquet of flowers, which she gracefully accepted. She then went to Mrs. M., and received a bouquet from her, and another from Mr. P., who sat at the end of the circle.

Gathering these flowers in her hands, she passed behind the curtain, and on her next appearance in the course of a couple of minutes she was without the flowers. She shook hands with and embraced Mr. W. P., kissed Mrs. Mould and others on the cheek or mouth, and saluted nearly the entire circle. When she approached me she proffered her right hand, which I took in mine, and held it while she kissed me on the brow; the feeling was that of human lips, and the explosive sound that of kissing. Her hand was warm and moist. She again entered the recess, and I observed several times during this remarkable séance, that when the psychic form remained visibly in our presence for about five minutes, her garments became less white and substantial, and her power of motion appeared to decrease; but on entering the recess and returning, her dress was brilliantly white, and her motions free and firm. She appeared to lose power and solidity in the open room. She entered the recess and re-appeared among the sitters at least twenty times during the evening and always with the same results.

When next she presented herself I was desirous of knowing her exact height and requested permission to stand beside her; this she kindly granted, and I stood before and within a few inches of her. I then saw that the top of her head was on a level with my eyes, and that her height was 5ft. 5in., that is $3\frac{1}{2}$ inches taller than the medium, who lay visibly on the sofa. After the measuring, she sat down on an unoccupied arm-chair which stood near the centre of the room, and while she and we sat in a hushed and impressive silence one of the gentlemen present introduced the following words, which were sung softly and earnestly by the company (Hymn 193, "When the hours of day are numbered," &c.)

The hymn being finished, the form again retired, and reappearing, looked cautiously round the room, and when at a distance from her medium, made mesmeric passes towards her.

The medium, who had up to that time lain perfectly still on the sofa, began to move, changing the position of her hands, and seemed to be under some peculiar influence; the psychic form, or palpable apparition, then approached the medium, and bending over her, embraced and kissed her fervently, and for a short time medium and psychic form were clasped in each other's arms. The psychic form then released herself from the medium, and sat on the sofa near her feet. Again retiring and reappearing, she sat gracefully on the vacant chair, and Mr. P. rose and pronounced a very impressive and appropriate invocation. The form again retired, and returning, sat beside the medium, bent gently over her, took her in her arms and raised her up into a sitting posture; in this position the normally and abnormally embodied human beings clung together for upwards of a minute, and then the medium was gently laid upon her pillow.

Again, the psychic form retired, and reappeared and walked round the room, shaking hands with the sitters. I requested permission to feel her pulse, and she immediately stepped towards me, extended her right hand, placed it in my left hand, and permitted me with the forefinger of my right hand to feel her pulse. It was feeble but perfectly recognisable and beat at what appeared to be the rate of 70 per minute. I counted the beats aloud up to twenty beats. She afterwards sat on the arm-chair, and was resting gracefully and easily when we asked her to write in our presence. I supplied a pocket-book and paper to write upon, Mr. M. supplied a pencil. She took these; and resting the book and paper on the arm of the chair, she wrote "Good-night"; and I have now the paper containing the writing in my possession.

She entered the recess, reappeared, and walked round the room, shook hands with all who were present, permitted several to feel her raiment, which, judging by feeling and appearance, seemed to consist of the finest muslin. After this, she sat on the vacant chair, and Mr. H. delivered a very suitable address of thanks to the other-world visitor who had kindly favoured us with her presence. She retired within the curtain after having been with us upwards of one hour and a-half, and this wonderful séance closed.

The weather was almost unbearably hot, and after the last appearance of our psychic visitor I slightly opened the room door, and took charge of it until the light was turned fully up.

The medium gradually and slowly recovered from the trance in which she had been the whole evening, and was so feeble and exhausted that the two ladies present had to assist her across the room. Immediately she left the sofa I took up my position near it, moved it quite away from where it had been standing, examined it carefully, drew aside the curtains of the recess, took down the curtains, and did not discover anything that presented the slightest appearance of deception.

I examined minutely the walls, floor, &c., and all were perfectly sound and good. In my opinion there was not the possibility of successful deception, nor was any deception attempted.

I refrain at present from expressing any opinion as to theories, but as to facts I believe those just detailed are as real, genuine, and objective as the fact that the Thames flows past London.

TRANSITION.

On Tuesday, the 8th inst., Mr. Richard Gale, for many years editor of the Hull News, passed to the higher life in his fifty-fourth year. He was a firm and intelligent Spiritualist, and while he never needlessly thrust his views before people to whom they would be unwelcome, he was never ashamed to avow his convictions when he felt that he could do so with advantage to the cause of what was to him a great and serious truth. His gentle nature and kindly manners won for him the affectionate regard of all his friends and colleagues.

Mr. D. D. HOME, who has for some years been an invalid, is now, we are pleased to learn, a little better. He spent the last summer in Switzerland, and is now residing in Paris. A friend, writing about him, says that he has suffered terribly.

A very interesting biographical notice of Mr. H. Cholmondeley-Pennell, with an excellent portrait, recently appeared in the Fishing Gazette. Mr. Pennell, it will be recollected, published, under the title of "Bringing it to Book," a series of extraordinary slate-writing séances that had taken place at his house.

The Newcastle-on-Tyne Secular Society has invited Alderman Barkas to deliver a lecture in the Cordwainers' Hall, Nelson-street, on Sunday evening, December 20th, commencing at seven o'clock. Mr. Barkas has accepted the invitation, and will lecture on "Some of the recognised teachings of Secularism incompatible with well-authenticated modern facts."

In the recent action by Mrs. Weldon against Sir Henry de Bathe, in which she obtained £1,000 damages and costs, the defendant in his evidence remarked: "I have said that all Spiritualists should be shut up. That is my private opinion, for I think all Spiritualists are very weak-minded people." In the face of such expressions, it would be an insult to mention the names of those distinguished Spiritualists who belong to the profession of which this well-informed person is also a member.

Mr. W. EQLINTON, writing to the Golden Gate, our Californian contemporary, says:—"As far as I can see, mediumship, and the cause of Spiritualism generally, appear to be much more free in this country from cumber-spots than in America. The constant reports of frauds in the United States must shake the movement there to its foundation, and I cannot myself fail to wonder how it is that the Spiritualists tolerate well-known frauds so long. It is probably due to the methods of investigation, which, in this country, are well-nigh perfect—giving greater security to genuine mediums, and putting the movement on a proper footing."

[In this column will be given from time to time such accounts of psychical phenomena as seem to be worthy of permanent record. Beyond the general classification indicated, no attempt at tabulation will at present be made; that work will follow in due course. In furtherance of this object we shall be pleased to receive from our readers brief reports of phenomena subject to two conditions (1) That a colourless statement of facts without comment is given; and (2) that communications are accompanied by the names and addresses of those concerned, not necessarily for publication, though we should naturally prefer to be at liberty to publish them. Amongst the phenomena referred to may be mentioned:—
A.—Mesmerism.
B.—Trance.
C.—Clairvoyance.
D.—Thought-reading.
E.—Prescience, Previsional and Coincidental Dreams.
F.—Apparitions.
G.—The Human "Double."
H.—Presence at a Distance.
I.—Haunted Houses.
K.—Spirit Identity.
L.—Materialised Spirit Forms.
M.—Rappings, Knockings, and Stone Throwings.
N.—The Spirit Voice and Clair-audience.
O.—Psychography.
P.—Automatic Writing.
Q.—Movement of Material Objects without Physical Contact.
R.—Speaking and Writing in Tongues.
S.—Miscellaneous Phenomena.
T.—Coincidences.

Friends having had experience of any of these phenomena will be doing us a service if they will report them to us, giving—

- (1) The names and addresses of the persons concerned.

- (3) A brief account of the occurrence.

Letters should be addressed to the Editor of "LIGHT," 16, Craven-street, Charing Cross.]

CLASS G.—DOUBLE OF THE LIVING.

In the course of last autumn my daughter-in-law, Mrs. A. Wedgwood, who lives at Folkestone, procured for an old servant, named Caroline H., a place with a lady living near Croydon. On the 7th December my daughter-in-law had a letter from Caroline saying "If you know what a place this is you would be surprised, and would not recommend any one to it."

The same morning her servant Elizabeth, when first she saw her, told her that the previous night, after she had been some time asleep, she was awake by the door opening, when she saw Caroline walk into her room in her nightgown with her hair hanging, looking very white and wretched.

Elizabeth spoke to her and said: "Well, Caroline, aren't you happy and comfortable in your place? You do look worried!" Caroline walked out and shut the door without answering. Elizabeth had no opportunity of knowing that her mistress had had a letter from anybody, as it had been brought to her half-an-hour before Elizabeth came downstairs.

The fact that Elizabeth was awake by the door opening seems equally to exclude the supposition that it was a hallucination on her part, or that it was a mere telepathic impression in her mind of the discomforts which Caroline was feeling so strongly, as described in the letter then on its way to Folkestone. On inquiry it appears that Caroline is not aware of having thought about Elizabeth on the night in question, nor had she any dream about her.

CLASS T.—COINCIDENCES.

[While engaged in selecting and sifting the records which appear in this column, we have come across a few stories which do not seem to fit exactly into any special class. We refer to what are generally called "coincidences," which may or may not be due to spiritual influence or suggestion. In some cases there is direct proof that they are due to some action on the part of an outside intelligence, but in other instances this fact is not so clear. The appearance of any story under this heading does not necessarily imply that it is regarded as a psychical phenomenon, and the reverse, of course, holds equally good. The following, forwarded to us by a correspondent, has been put into its present form by the private secretary of the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, who, in response to an application, replied that if thought suitable for "LIGHT" he should be pleased for it to be so used. The story is exactly as it has been related by Mr. Spurgeon.]

During an illness of Mrs. Spurgeon, at Brighton, twenty years ago, before the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon started for London one morning, he asked her if there was anything she particularly wished for. Before she told him, she made him promise that he would not try to procure the objects for which she had been longing. She then told him that she had been wishing for a piping-bullfinch and an opal ring. As his own house was being rebuilt, he dined at his secretary's. By the side of his plate lay a little parcel, which a lady had left for Mrs. Spurgeon. It contained an opal ring. After dinner Mr. Spurgeon went to visit a sick gentleman. The wife of the patient asked him if Mrs. Spurgeon would like a piping-bullfinch, that they had one, but that its music was trying to the invalid, and they would gladly part with it to one who would give it the requisite care. This intensified Mr. Spurgeon's surprise, and, after preaching at the Tabernacle in the evening, he took to Brighton what had been so strangely sent, went up to his wife's sick-room, and placed the objects she had longed for before her. She met him with a look of pained reproach, as if he had allowed his regard for her to override his promise, but when he detailed the true circumstances of the case she was filled with tearful surprise, and asked Mr. Spurgeon what he thought of it? His reply was characteristic: "I think you are one of your Heavenly Father's suffering children, and He just gives you what He knows will please and cheer you."

DEFERRED DEATH.

I once had a patient—an elderly lady of a highly nervous temperament—in whose case a remarkable phenomenon presented itself. At seventy-two years of age she had an illness which left her attenuated and very debilitated, indicative of her bodily forces being nearly exhausted; but there was no urgency for the constant attendance of the physician. A day came, however, when I was urgently sent for. I found her surrounded by her family, her heart's beats and her breathing were hardly perceptible, and sensibility was apparently gone. All thought her to be dying.

In the twinkling of an eye, to our amazement, she sat upright, as if starting out of deep sleep, and looked about wonderingly at the many solemn faces gathered about her bed. I broke silence by saying "You have had a lovely sleep!" to which she said, "Yes, very!" Smiling and pleased at the change, one after another left the room until I alone remained with the patient and her sister, and we two looked at each other, almost laughing in our revulsion of feeling from sympathetic anxiety to joy at the change so sudden.

This sudden springing back from apparently approaching death was to the family most mysterious and unaccountable. To my understanding the odic "silver cord" connecting the spiritual body with the natural, had been nearly severed; and I said that in deep sleep, as in trance, the spirit sometimes partially quits the body and communes with the disembodied; still being able to return to it through the "silver cord" not being severed. That such was the case here was evident by the almost imperceptible action of the vital organs, and the cessation of sensibility; which state was changed by the re-entering of the spirit into the body, restoring—in this case with remarkable suddenness, vital power to the organism.

With this revivification the patient returned to the state she was in the day before, resuming her usual aliment and observing the established routine of her invalid chamber; friends came and went, relieved of special anxiety about her.

But the progressive wearing away process went on its natural course. At the same hour as before on that day week, the same message of urgency came to the physician. I arrived in time to see my patient in the same state as before: to witness the same fainting heart pulsations and feeblest breathings; ceasing this time with the complete severance of the "silver cord."

Hambrook, Bristol. S. EADON, M.A., M.D., Ph.D.

Mr. J. C. WRIGHT, a trance-medium, well-known in the provinces, is now lecturing in Philadelphia with great success.

Mr. ROBERTS, editor of the Spiritual journal Mind and Matter, Philadelphia, has been sentenced to twenty-nine days imprisonment, and a fine of £40 for a criminal libel.

Dr. JOHN E. PERDON, so well-known to many of our readers, is announced to give lectures in the United States on psychical and Spiritualistic subjects. His address is Gayoso Hotel, Memphis, Tennessee.

On the night of Monday last the premises at 16, Craven-street were broken into, and every office in the building ransacked. The thieves managed to secure a certain amount of booty, and got away without discovery. On entering the office in the morning a scene of indescribable confusion met the eye. Books, letters, papers, drawers, and furniture were, to say the least, somewhat mixed, and we must therefore beg the indulgence of correspondents if their communications have not received ready attention. We regret to say that a certain amount of money belonging to "LIGHT" was stolen.

A MESMERIC INSTITUTION.

A preliminary meeting in furtherance of the above object was held at Dr. Wyld's house, 41, Courtfield-road, S.W., on Sunday, the 13th.

Mr. Regan, Mr. Younger, Mr. Price, Mr. Redman, and Miss Godfrey, as professional mesmerists, were present; also Captain James, Mr. Arthur Lillie, Mrs. De Morgan, Major and Mrs. Wallace Carpenter, Mr. Maw, Miss Hamilton, Mrs. and Miss Lewis, Mr. Richards, and others interested in mesmerism. Mr. Stainton Moses, being necessarily out of town, was unable to attend.

Dr. Wyld stated that the movement had arisen out of the generous offer of Mr. Regan to give £100 towards the founding of an institution or hospital for mesmeric treatment. He explained how the Mesmeric Institute, founded nearly fifty years ago, and which was supported by Dr. Elliotson, after doing much good, collapsed for want of funds, and he regarded this as a sign that we should begin with moderate views and establish an institute for out-patients only, and as a centre where a registry of mesmeric healers could be consulted by the public. The institution would also afford an opportunity for experimental and phenomenal mesmerism, and his view was that the use of two rooms, one as a waiting room, and the other as an operating room, would afford sufficient accommodation to begin with, and that these rooms should be in a situation readily accessible by rail or otherwise. He also suggested that there should be a small committee composed of those who practically understood mesmerism, and that the institution should have the assistance of a qualified medical man who could testify as to the cases cured.

Mr. Regan said his view somewhat differed from that of Dr. Wyld, for he had hoped that his offer would have drawn other offers from the many rich people who took an interest in the subject, and that a small hospital might be thus founded; but he was willing to assist any good plan which might bring the blessings of mesmerism to the poor as well as to the rich.

Mr. Younger thought there was no great necessity for an institution such as had been described. His own house, and the house of every professional mesmerist, was such an institution, and he feared the interference of a committee or of doctors would only retard progress, and freedom, and he for one could never submit to any dictation in these matters; but, he added, if such an institution as described were established he would be glad to support it.

Dr. Wyld, in reply to Mr. Younger, explained that neither the committee nor the doctor of the institution would seek to control any qualified mesmerist in his work, but just as physicians in separate practice desired to have hospitals to work in, so he was sure practical mesmerists would find a central institution of great benefit, not only to the cause generally, but to individuals, by giving mesmerism the aid of a central organisation.

Mrs. De Morgan remarked that the original Mesmeric Institute suffered from the officious interferences mentioned by Mr. Younger, but that no such interference could be contemplated in the present instance, and she felt sure that some organised centre would add to the success as well as to the dignity of the movement.

Mr. Price would be glad to support a Mesmeric Institution, and believed that it would be the means of extending the usefulness of this mode of treatment.

Mr. Redman and Mr. Richards spoke to the same effect.

Mr. J. H. Maw said he took great interest in the spread of mesmerism, and fully believed that the present chaotic state of mesmerism was inimical to its success, and that by organisation all parties concerned would be benefited and the subject be raised in public estimation.

Major Wallace Carpenter would support such an institution, one great benefit to be got from which would be that the public could there find a registry of mesmerists with special endowments in regard to the various forms of disease.

The meeting then separated, and in the meantime any suggestions on this subject can be sent either to Dr. Wyld or to the Office of "LIGHT" for publication.

DR. STRATHERN, having to give evidence at the Middleborough Petty Sessions, declined to "kiss a book which had been handled by all sorts of people," but offered to do so if a piece of clean paper were laid upon it. The Bench declined this, or even to receive his affirmation. He finally kissed the book under protest, on the ground that he "ran the risk of catching some disease."

THE EXPERIMENTAL RESEARCH SECTION

OF THE

LONDON SPIRITUALIST ALLIANCE

Has been established with the object primarily of—

Promoting systematic research by experts, including (a) the encouragement of exact methods of inquiry; (b) the accurate recording of observed facts; (c) the regulation of admission to and the graduation of circles, so as to afford a complete and progressive course of investigation and instruction; (d) the more careful treatment of mediums, and (e) the publication in the Spiritualist Press of carefully tabulated results.

And secondarily of—

Assisting inquiry into Spiritualism either by (a) directing inquirers, where necessary, in a preliminary course of reading; (b) advising in the formation of private family circles; or (c) where practicable furnishing introductions to already organised circles.

Members of the London Spiritualist Alliance are eligible for election to the Experimental Research Section. The minimum subscription to this section is £1 1s. per annum, payable in January for the current year, but it is hoped that persons interested in the extension of research will contribute to a special fund for that purpose.

The members of the Research Section are divided into four grades, viz.:

1. CIRCLES OF EXPERTS,
2. ELEMENTARY CIRCLES OF INVESTIGATORS,
3. INQUIRERS,
4. A CENTRAL COMMITTEE OF CONTROL.

Circles of Experts will study, at their own discretion and opportunity, special groups of phenomena. They will especially direct attention to the means of securing the best conditions of observation. Their experiments will be such as could not safely be made in a less harmonious circle, or by less experienced persons. They will so experiment as to throw light on perplexing problems, and generally to add to our now scanty store of knowledge as to the methods employed by the invisible operators, the results of whose action we are all more or less acquainted with, but of whose methods of operation we know almost nothing.

Inquirers into Spiritualism, upon becoming members of the Research Section, will, if desired, be introduced to some Expert who will give the necessary advice and guidance; will direct their reading, if required; will give help in difficulty, and generally act as Mentor and sponsor to them, until, in due time, they become fit to take their place in an elementary Circle of Investigators. As circumstances allow, inquirers will be drafted into such a circle, or if it be preferred they will be advised and directed in the formation of a private circle.

GENERAL RULES.

All groups of circles of whatever degree are subject absolutely to the direction and governance of a Central Committee of Control. The names of all who desire to take part in these circles will be submitted to that Committee, and the election will be by ballot. Great care will be exercised in the selection of suitable persons, and their arrangement in circles so composed as to secure the utmost possible harmony. These circles will meet, each at its own convenience, in private houses for the most part, and their proceedings will be strictly private. They will be conducted by an Expert Director chosen by the members and approved by the Central Committee of Control. Accurate minutes of all proceedings will be kept by a Recorder; and these minutes, verified at the opening of each meeting, will be submitted at stated intervals to the Committee of Control, who alone will decide as to their publication. No publication will be permissible without the sanction of the Committee; and from its decision there will be no appeal. Each member of the various circles will pledge himself to keep all proceedings strictly private until authority is given for publication. The names of the persons who constitute a particular circle need be known only to themselves and to the Committee of Control.

PLEDGES REQUIRED.

Those who wish to take part in this work will be invited to pledge themselves

1. To an ungrudging assistance, within reasonable bounds, to any fellow member who may be assigned to them for guidance.
2. To sink absolutely any private or personal feelings that may in any way be thought likely to interfere with the perfect harmony that must characterise an inquiry of this nature if success is to be attained; or that may be at variance with the spirit in which alone this investigation can be profitably undertaken.
3. To obey, and submit to the reasonable control, of the Central Committee of Control, which is charged with the administration of this plan, and to preserve a faithful reticence as to any results obtained in any circle, until the records are published by order of that Committee.

No expression of opinion as to theories which may be held to account for observed facts, or acceptance of any special form of belief, is sought from any member. The Central Committee of Control, however, regards psychical facts from a Spiritualist point of view, though it is by no means bound down to any special theory, and may, indeed, receive and canvass any that may be proposed; and the Spiritualist Alliance, as its name implies, is, as a body, professedly Spiritualistic.

CENTRAL COMMITTEE OF CONTROL.

The constitution of this body, together with other details explanatory of the general scheme of work, will be found in the pamphlet entitled, "Spiritualism at Home and Abroad." Persons wishing to join the Experimental Research Section are requested, if already members of the London Spiritualist Alliance, to apply to the President, 16, Craven-street, Charing Cross, S.W., who will enter into further communication with them on the subject. If not members of the Alliance, application for such membership should first be made to the Hon. Sec. at the same address. On election, the new member of the Alliance will be eligible for admission, if approved by the Central Committee of Control, to the Experimental Research Section.

ROBERT CHAMBERS.—"I have for many years known that these phenomena are real, as distinguished from impostures; and it is not of yesterday that I concluded they were calculated to explain much that has been doubtful in the past; and, when fully accepted, revolutionise the whole frame of human opinion on many important matters."—Extract from a Letter to A. Russel Wallace.

PROFESSOR HARE, EMERITUS PROFESSOR OF CHEMISTRY IN THE UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA.—"Far from abating my confidence in the inferences respecting the agencies of the spirits of deceased mortals, in the manifestations of which I have given an account in my work, I have, within the last nine months" (this was written in 1858), "had more striking evidences of that agency than those given in the work in question."

PROFESSOR CHALLIS, THE LATE PLUMERIAN PROFESSOR OF ASTRONOMY AT CAMBRIDGE.—"I have been unable to resist the large amount of testimony to such facts, which has come from many independent sources, and from a vast number of witnesses. . . . In short, the testimony has been so abundant and contemporaneous, that either the facts must be admitted to be such as are reported, or the possibility of certifying facts by human testimony must be given up."—Clerical Journal, June, 1862.

PROFESSOR GREGORY, F.R.S.E.—"The essential question is this, What are the proofs of the agency of departed spirits? Although I cannot say that I yet feel the sure and firm conviction on this point which I feel on some others, I am bound to say that the higher phenomena, recorded by so many truthful and honourable men, appear to me to render the spiritual hypothesis almost certain. . . . I believe that if I could myself see the higher phenomena alluded to I should be satisfied, as are all those who have had the best means of judging of the truth of the spiritual theory."

LORD BROUGHAM.—"There is but one question I would ask the author, Is the Spiritualism of this work foreign to our materialistic, manufacturing age? No; for amidst the varieties of mind which diverse circumstances produce are found those who cultivate man's highest faculties; to these the author addresses himself. But even in the most cloudless skies of scepticism I see a rain-cloud, if it be no bigger than a man's hand; it is modern Spiritualism."—Preface by Lord Brougham to "The Book of Nature," By C. O. Groom Napier, F.C.S.

THE LONDON DIALECTICAL COMMITTEE reported: "1. That sounds of a very varied character, apparently proceeding from articles of furniture, the floor and walls of the room—the vibrations accompanying which sounds are often distinctly perceptible to the touch—occur, without being produced by muscular action or mechanical contrivance. 2. That movements of heavy bodies take place without mechanical contrivance of any kind, or adequate exertion of muscular force by those present, and frequently without contact or connection with any person. 3. That these sounds and movements often occur at the time and in the manner asked for by persons present, and, by means of a simple code of signals, answer questions and spell out coherent communications."

PROFESSOR BARRETT, F.R.S.E.—"I know and rejoice in the blessing Spiritualism has been to my own faith, and to that of several dear friends of mine. Moreover, I cordially recognise the fact that in bereavement and deep distress numbers have been cheered and consoled by the hope that Spiritualism has set before them. . . . So far from Materialism being true, I do not believe a single person has ever yet lived on this earth who has truly and heartily desired to know if an intelligent and personal existence be possible without our present bodily organism, and has steadily set himself to solve this supreme question with all the help he can gain from every source.—I say I do not believe any such earnest seeker after truth has ever failed to obtain a clear and definite answer in the affirmative."

CAMILLE FLAMMARION, THE FRENCH ASTRONOMER, AND MEMBER OF THE ACADEMIE FRANCAISE.—"I do not hesitate to affirm my conviction, based on personal examination of the subject, that any scientific man who declares the phenomena denominated 'magnetic,' 'somnambulic,' 'mediumic,' and others not yet explained by science to be 'impossible,' is one who speaks without knowing what he is talking about; and also any man accustomed, by his professional avocations, to scientific observation—provided that his mind be not biased by pre-conceived opinions, nor his mental vision blinded by that opposite kind of illusion, unhappily too common in the learned world, which consists in imagining that the laws of Nature are already known to us, and that everything which appears to overstep the limit of our present formulas is impossible—may acquire a radical and absolute certainty of the reality of the facts alluded to."

CROMWELL F. VARLEY, F.R.S.—"Twenty-five years ago I was a hard-headed unbeliever. . . . Spiritual phenomena, however, suddenly and quite unexpectedly, were soon after developed in my own family. . . . This led me to inquire and to try numerous experiments in such a way as to preclude, as much as circumstances would permit, the possibility of trickery and self-deception. . . . He then details various phases of the phenomena which had come within the range of his personal experience, and continues: "Other and numerous phenomena have occurred, proving the existence (a) of forces unknown to science; (b) the power of instantly reading my thoughts; (c) the presence of some intelligence or intelligences controlling these powers. . . . That the phenomena occur there is overwhelming evidence, and it is too late now to deny their existence."

ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, F.G.S.—"My position, therefore, is that the phenomena of Spiritualism in their entirety do not require further confirmation. They are proved, quite as well as any facts are proved in other sciences, and it is not denial or quibbling that can disprove any of them, but only fresh facts and accurate deductions from those facts. When the opponents of Spiritualism can give a record of their researches approaching in duration and completeness to those of its advocates; and when they can discover and show in detail, either how the phenomena are produced or how the many sane and able men here referred to have been deluded into a coincident belief that they have witnessed them; and when they can prove the correctness of their theory by producing a like belief in a body of equally sane and able unbelievers—then, and not till then, will it be necessary for Spiritualists to produce fresh confirmation of facts which are, and always have been, sufficiently real and indisputable to satisfy any honest and persevering inquirer."—Miracles and Modern Spiritualism.

DR. LOCKHART ROBERTSON.—"The writer" (i.e., Dr. L. Robertson) "can now no more doubt the physical manifestations of so-called Spiritualism than he would any other fact, as, for example, the fall of the apple to the ground, of which his senses informed him. As stated above, there was no place or chance of any legerdemain, or fraud, in these physical manifestations. He is aware, even from recent experience, of the impossibility of convincing anyone, by a mere narrative of events apparently so out of harmony with all our knowledge of the laws which govern the physical world, and he places these facts on record rather as an act of justice due to those whose similar statements he had elsewhere doubted and denied, than with either the desire or hope of convincing others. Yet he cannot doubt the ultimate recognition of facts of the truth of which he is so thoroughly convinced. Admit these physical manifestations, and a strange and wide world of research is opened to our inquiry. This field is new to the materialist mind of the last two centuries, which even in the writings of divines of the English Church, doubts and denies all spiritual manifestations and agencies, be they good or evil."—From a letter by Dr. Lockhart Robertson, published in the Dialectical Society's Report on Spiritualism, p. 24.

NASSAU WILLIAM SENIOR.—"No one can doubt that phenomena like these (Phrenology, Homoeopathy, and Mesmerism) deserve to be observed, recorded, and arranged; and whether we call by the name of mesmerism, or by any other name, the science which proposes to do this, is a mere question of nomenclature. Among those who profess this science there may be careless observers, prejudiced recorders, and rash systematisers; their errors and defects may impede the progress of knowledge, but they will not stop it. And we have no doubt that, before the end of this century, the wonders which perplex almost equally those who accept and those who reject modern mesmerism will be distributed into defined classes, and found subject to ascertainable laws—in other words, will become the subjects of a science." These views will prepare us for the following statement, made in the Spiritual Magazine, 1864, p. 336: "We have only to add, as a further tribute to the attainments and honours of Mr. Senior, that he was by long inquiry and experience a firm believer in spiritual power and manifestations. Mr. Home was his frequent guest, and Mr. Senior made no secret of his belief among his friends. He it was who recommended the publication of Mr. Home's recent work by Messrs. Longmans, and he authorised the publication, under initials, of one of the striking incidents there given, which happened to a near and dear member of his family."

WHAT CONJURERS SAY ABOUT PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

Mediums, who are the instruments of an external agency, have, more than once, been confronted with conjurers who deceive by sleight of hand; and in the same manner that no man of science who has thoroughly and fairly investigated the phenomena has failed to become convinced of their reality, so no conjurer who has been confronted with the same facts has been able to explain their occurrence by prestidigitation. Houdin, Jacobs, Bellachini, Hermann, Kellar, and others have already confessed their powerlessness to produce under the same conditions what occurs without human intervention in the presence of a medium.

Testimony of Robert Houdin.

The Marquis Rades de Mirville published during the lifetime of Houdin two letters from the latter, in his "Mémoire adressé à MM. les membres de l'Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques, sur un grand nombre de phénomènes merveilleux intéressant également la Religion, la Science, et les hommes du Monde," in which the conjurer confesses his inability to explain the phenomena he witnessed in the presence of Alexis, the clairvoyant. A circumstantial account is given of M. de Mirville's visit to Houdin for the purpose of engaging him in this investigation, of the latter's confidence in his own ability to detect the trick, and of what took place at the séance, the conditions of which were entirely under Houdin's control. This account extends over twelve pages, and its accuracy is confirmed by Houdin in the first of the documents now translated:—

"Although very far from accepting the eulogies which M. — is good enough to bestow upon me, and especially insisting that I am not at all committed to opinions, either in favour of magnetism or against it, I can, nevertheless, not refrain from declaring that the facts above reported are entirely correct (sont de la plus complète exactitude), and that, the more I reflect upon them, the more impossible I find it to rank them among those which belong to my art and profession."

ROBERT HOUDIN.

"4th May, 1847.
A fortnight later, M. de Mirville received another letter, in which the following, referring to another séance, occurs:—

"I have, therefore, returned from this séance as astonished as it is possible to be, and persuaded that it is utterly impossible that chance or skill could ever produce effects so wonderful (tout à fait incroyable que le hasard ou l'adresse puisse jamais produire des effets aussi merveilleux).—I am, monsieur, &c."

(Signed) ROBERT HOUDIN.

Testimony of Harry Kellar.

Harry Kellar, a distinguished professor of legerdemain, investigated the slate-writing phenomena which occurred in the presence of Mr. Eglinton, at Calcutta, in January, 1882, and on the 25th of that month he addressed a letter to the editor of the Indian Daily News, in which he said:—

"In your issue of the 13th January I stated that I should be glad of an opportunity of participating in a séance with a view of giving an unbiased opinion as to whether, in my capacity of a professional prestidigitator, I could give a natural explanation of effects said to be produced by spiritual aid.

"I am indebted to the courtesy of Mr. Eglinton, the Spiritualistic medium now in Calcutta, and of his host, Mr. J. Meugens, for affording me the opportunity I craved.

"It is needless to say I went as a sceptic, but I must own that I have come away utterly unable to explain, by any natural means, the phenomena that I witnessed on Tuesday evening. I will give a brief description of what took place."

After describing several successful experiments, Mr. Kellar proceeds:—

"In respect to the above manifestations, I can only say that I do not expect my account of them to gain general credence. Forty-eight hours before I should not have believed anyone who described such manifestations under similar circumstances. I still remain a sceptic as regards Spiritualism, but I repeat my inability to explain or account for what must have been an intelligent force that produced the writing on the slate, which, if my senses are to be relied on, was in no way the result of trickery or sleight of hand."

On the 30th of the same month Mr. Kellar addressed another letter to the Indian Daily News, reporting some experiences of another kind with Mr. Eglinton, and regarding which he said:—

"In conclusion, let me state that after a most stringent trial and strict scrutiny of these wonderful experiences I can arrive at no other conclusion than that there was no trace of trickery in any form; nor was there in the room any mechanism or machinery by which could be produced the phenomena which had taken place. The ordinary mode by which Maskelyne and other conjurers imitate levitation or the floating test could not possibly be done in the room in which we were assembled."

The Testimony of Professor Jacobs.

Professor Jacobs, writing to the editor of Licht, oder Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—

"Spite of the assertions, more or less trustworthy, of the French and English journalists, and spite of the foolish jealousies of ignorant conjurers, I feel it my duty to show up the bad faith of one party and the chicanery of the other. All that has been said or done adverse to these American mediums is absolutely trustworthy. If we would rightly judge of a thing we must understand it, and neither the journalists nor the conjurers possessed the most elementary knowledge of the science that governs these phenomena. As a prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the mediumistic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect.

"Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. If (as I have every reason to hope) the psychical studies, to which I am applying myself at this time, succeed, I shall be able to establish clearly, and that by public demonstration, the immense line of demarcation which separates mediumistic phenomena from conjuring proper, and then equivocation will be no longer possible, and persons will have to yield to evidence, or deny through predetermination to deny."

"Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also the individuality of the spirit in 'spiritual manifestation.' I authorise you, dear sir, to insert this letter in your next number, if agreeable to you," &c., &c.

Testimony of Samuel Bellachini.

Samuel Bellachini, Court Conjurer at Berlin, made the following declaration in December, 1877:—

"I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the slightest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Bern; Butlerof, in St. Petersburg, to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the 'How' of this subject to be premature, and according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a notary and witnesses."

"Berlin, December 6th, 1877. (Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI."

ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By "M.A. (Oxon.)"

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct séances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experiences in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two, of negative, passive temperament, and preferably of the female sex, the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each sitter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Scepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitter spirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear. Patience is essential, and it may be necessary to meet ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such a trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful séance.

The first indications of success usually are a cold breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twitchings of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not aiding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over, but not in contact with, it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if the attempt to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might disconcert an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will check noisy manifestations.

Lastly, Try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your reason. Do not enter into a vague solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well-grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.

PHASES OF MATERIALIZATION.

IN THE

OBJECTIVE PHENOMENA OF SPIRITUALISM.

By "M. A. (Oxon.)"

Again, Mr. H. M. Dunphy—a name well-known in literary circles—testifies* that he begged permission to see the medium and "Florence" at the same time. The latter drew aside the curtain, and Mr. Dunphy's narrative proceeds:—

"Still holding the curtain, Florence pointed with her disengaged hand, and there, seated in the chair, with her head thrown over her left shoulder and the right side of her face visible, was unquestionably the form . . . of Miss Showers. He then asked to be allowed instantly to follow the form into the cabinet. The request was granted. Florence had not disappeared a second when she put her right hand and arm through the curtain and said, 'Come now.' I sprang up, and throwing aside the curtain, which I held back wide, I stood inside but could see nothing except Miss Showers still in a trance in the arm-chair. . . . I then held my hand over the head of the medium, and it was grasped by a thin, cold touch, but I could see no hand. I then said, 'Will you touch me when I touch the medium?' 'Yes,' Florence replied. 'Hold out your hand and rest it on her head.' This I did, and was again grasped."

Mr. Blackburn gives his testimony, further, that in Mrs. Showers' own house at Teignmouth, Devon, he passed a thread through the perforated lobe of Miss Showers' ear, bringing the two ends of the thread into the room in which he sat. "Leonore"—one of the materialised forms that were accustomed to appear—came out into the room. Her ears were not pierced; and her foot was malformed, and was closely examined.†

The records of Mr. Eglinton's mediumship would furnish a vast amount of matter of high value. But I am compelled to present specimens only, by reason of exigencies of space, and, moreover, I am glad to know that an exhaustive record of facts observed through his mediumship is now in course of preparation. The following letter,‡ presenting some important matter which will be useful in forming conclusions as to the methods employed, may be appended here.

SIR,—Your readers are aware that Mr. W. Eglinton, in order to continue his important work of psychography without suffering from undue exhaustion, has found it necessary to decline many requests for sittings for materialisation. It was under pressure of friendship that he kindly consented to favour me with a séance for Tuesday, October 28th, 1884, and as some of the manifestations were remarkable and unusual, your readers may be interested in a brief relation of the leading phenomena. The circle was a large one, comprising eleven persons—four ladies and seven gentlemen. It was very harmonious, and the physical and meteorological conditions were all that could be desired. Chairs were arranged in the usual semi-circle, and one gas burner was kept alight during the continuance of the séance. I occupied a chair at one extremity of the circle, and within three feet of the curtain. During the evening we were favoured with seven materialisations. Most of them, if not all, were of the third or highest order; which, considering the number of sitters, was certainly remarkable. In my experience, the forms appearing either at a large or at an undeveloped and promiscuous circle, may, with very rare exceptions, be classed under either the first or second order; that is, either "transfigurations" or "animation of the model." The whole of the forms this evening were, in my opinion, true materialisations. Two of the figures made great efforts to obtain recognition, but neither of the sitters, to whom the materialised spirits pointedly addressed themselves, were able to recognise them with absolute certainty.

The following singular phenomenon then occurred. An object, dark as pitch, and resembling a black cloud more than anything else, came from under the curtain and remained in front of where I was sitting. It was not more than eighteen inches from the ground, and swayed backwards and forwards. In process of time it assumed a rotary motion, and two patches of white vapour became visible. As the process continued, I could dimly trace the outline of a form, apparently sitting on the ground at my feet, with its arms moving continuously backwards and forwards with a circular motion. At this stage, the arms only of the figure were clearly developed. Gradually the white material increased, and a face and bust arose, the arms still keeping up the same motion as if weaving. By degrees, and rapidly at the close, a tall male figure, dressed in the usual beautiful white material, was perfectly evolved, the darkness in which it had first emerged having disappeared as if absorbed, or dispersed like mist before the sun. Thus eleven persons had an opportunity of witnessing, in front of the curtain and within the circle, the whole process of materialising a form.

As a matter of evidence, it is worth noting, too, that during the séance, at the time that one of the appearances was in the circle, the medium in the dark room was taken with a fit of coughing, which was heard by all and commented upon.

The most remarkable phenomena occurred at the close of the séance. A noise as if two persons were wrestling was heard in the cabinet. It increased, as if a struggle were taking place. At this juncture, and when we were wondering what it meant, the curtains were parted, and the medium was literally thrown forward into the circle. Behind him, and holding back both curtains with the outstretched arms, stood the materialised form of "Ernest." As the medium staggered backwards in a state of insensibility, he would have fallen to the ground had he not been caught in the arms of the materialised spirit. Momentary as it was, it sufficed for the whole of the eleven spectators to witness the presence of the spirit and the medium in the circle at one and the same time. Immediately the curtain closed on Eglinton, I was directed by "Joey" to enter the dark room and take the medium a glass of water. Having it ready at my side I lost not a moment in complying. Feeling my way to the sofa I found the medium reclining, and still in a state of trance. Raising his head I gave him the water, and while doing so, "Joey" spoke to me in a direct voice and requested me on returning to increase the light. The medium after the séance was painfully exhausted.

The material or clothing in which the spirits appeared was the same throughout, although variously arranged on the person.

On a former occasion I had been allowed to handle and examine it in my hands for several minutes together. A few weeks since, a materialised spirit, standing by my side and plainly visible during the whole time, detached from his person a large portion of this lovely gauze, and put it over me, completely covering up my head and face. To the touch the material was firm and strong, as it resisted the lateral pressure of my thumbs. It was, however, as light in weight as a snowflake, and, as it swept the face, felt more like a cobweb than a substantial material.

J. H. M.

Another medium, with whom the electric test, applied to Miss H. Cook and to Miss Eva Fay, by Mr. W. Crookes, F.R.S., was successfully tried, is Mr. Haxby. Mr. J. Freeman* describes in the Medium a series of electric test séances. After several failures, on April 24th the medium was fixed with electric wires passing round his waist to the chairs on which he sat. If he moved a bell would at once ring. In less than a minute after the preparations were complete two forms walked from the cabinet into the room, and were visible to all the nine observers. They then retired and the bell rang. Once again the medium was tied with insulated wires thick enough to resist accidental breakage. Several forms came out, two at the same time, both talking while the medium's voice was also heard. The forms were desired to break the wire, which they did, and the bell rang and the medium, who was found exactly as he had been placed, was released."

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—The Editor of "LIGHT" cannot, save in exceptional cases, undertake to answer correspondence through the post. All inquiries reaching this office not later than Wednesday morning, will, as far as practicable, be answered in the ensuing number of "LIGHT."

W. GLANVILLE.—"Coincidence" received.

MARY BOOLE.—We will look up the MS. and return it to you.

NIZIDA.—MS. to hand. Both this and your former article will be used. Thanks for your condolence on the burglary at our offices. As you say, "LIGHT" has no money it can afford to lose. £5 10s. disappeared belonging to the Sustentation Fund, £3 from another Fund, and £8 of our personal money, besides other effects.

*XMAS CARD.—The Editor has received a card on which above the legend, "May it never be Empty," is drawn a leather purse. A facsimile of a £20 note is seen peeping out of it. We trust this is a good omen, and that the Sustentation Fund which is yet far short of the amount required, will speedily receive substantial additions.

WITH this issue we give the title page and index for 1885. In consequence of this demand upon our space we have been unable to give attention to several communications which would otherwise have appeared in the current issue.

ERRATUM.—In the reprint in pamphlet form of the address of the President of the London Spiritualist Alliance, entitled "Spiritualism at Home and Abroad," transfer the last line of page 8 to the bottom of page 24. Foreign papers please copy.

DUPOTER'S "MAGIC UNVEILED."—This remarkable work, the price of the French edition of which was £4, has been translated, and will shortly be published, edited by Mr. John S. Farmer. Full particulars will be announced in next week's "LIGHT," together with a notice to the few subscribers who have ordered "Present Day Problems."

SWISS POST OFFICE ORDER.—We have received a P.O.O. from Switzerland, but no letter of advice accompanied it. We wish to impress upon Continental subscribers the necessity of informing us of the despatch of their remittances, in order to avoid mistake and inconvenience. We have on several occasions received money in this way, and have not been able to trace the particulars, sometimes until months afterwards.

LAST week's number of the Medium was an exceptionally good one. It contained, amongst other interesting and valuable matter, a biographical sketch of our friend Mr. T. P. Barkas, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, which was accompanied by an admirable ink-photo. Its account of Mr. Barkas' life and work cannot fail to impress readers with a strong sense of the value of his testimony to Spiritualism. His all-round scientific knowledge and experience eminently qualify him to observe and pass judgment upon many matters connected with the subject. We hope this number of the Medium will be widely read, and those of our readers who have not seen it cannot do better than procure it at once from Mr. J. Burris, 15, Southampton-row, Holborn.

A PSYCHICAL EXPERIMENT.

Some years ago there was in our family a girl of fifteen, a medium for writing and drawing. When being controlled she said she felt as if a wet, warm band were tied round her arm above the elbow; then her hand became pale, cold, insensible, and powerless. Communications would be written through it, mostly from those departed ones known to us and to visitors.

One evening I brought home with me an investigator. Several neighbours were present having a séance with the medium, who, blindfolded, was writing. My friend and I took our seats as the clock struck nine. I looked at my watch and pointed out to my friend that it was a quarter too slow. For a test he wrote on a slip of paper, "Can you tell the time by Mr. Reed's watch?" Through the medium's hand was written, "Let me take the watch and I will try." I laid it on the table. The medium took it, opened it, held it near her right shoulder, and then wrote the time marked on the dial of my watch. I wrote, "Why did you put the watch near the medium's shoulder instead of her face?" The reply was through her hand. "In controlling this medium I sit by her side; I held the watch not to her face but to my own. In using her hand I am partially materialised, and so I held the watch so that I might see the hands and dial plate."

Next day my friend and I had some business at the Secretary of State's office, and in conversation there we spoke of the incident of the previous evening, when Colonel J. R. M., then Assistant-Secretary, attributed it to what he called psychological perception by the medium of the ideas in our own minds—to telepathy, as it is now called—my friend and I knowing how the hands of the watch pointed.

Some evenings afterwards several investigators came to my house, two of whom I knew carried hunting watches. These I beckoned out of the room, and proposed, for experiment, that we should, without looking ourselves at our watches, ask for the time they marked to be stated through the medium. They consented. Returning to the circle we laid our watches, mine being also a "hunter," on the table, with our separate requests in writing. The medium, who was blindfolded as before, took the watches up in succession, acted with each in the manner before related, and replaced them on the table with the correct statement of the time marked by them, each differing from the other. The time marked by them had manifestly been seen, but by no mortal eye. The psychological explanation by telepathy or mind-reading was thus disposed of.—C. A. REED, Portland. From the Golden Gate.

FAITH-CURE.—The New York Sun states Mrs. A. Wilcox, of Oneonta, had suffered for a year with what was said to be Bright's disease of the kidneys, and had been unable to walk for months. Being advised to try the faith-cure, she left off medicine and took to prayer. Some mornings ago a sympathising friend came to her, and they prayed together all the day. In the evening the patient rose from her bed, walked into the dining-room, and supped with the family with which she was residing, that of Mrs. Potter in Maple-street. The day before she had had to be lifted out of her bed. She has ever since improved, walking now freely about the house. She believes that she has been cured by faith.

A NOBLE BENEFACTION.—On Sunday morning, November 13th, at the meeting of the Society of Progressive Spiritualists of this city, San Francisco, immediately after the opening song, Mrs. E. S. Sleeper, a dear and noble souled lady, who has long enjoyed blessed communion with her loved ones in the spirit world, went forward to the rostrum, and, addressing the president, presented to the Society, as a contribution to the building fund, a deed to city property valued at over 10,000dol. After the presentation and cordial acknowledgment of it, the subject of "Spiritualism" was discussed. Bro. John Allyn taking for his text the benefaction of Mrs. Sleeper, urged upon others with affluent means the exercise of a like generosity, as a help to their soul's advancement in the future life. He referred to the case of a wealthy Spiritualist of that city, who, dying, made no provision for the cause in which he professed great interest, and whose vast estate was now involved in numerous law suits, and likely to be squandered in litigation. He thought that a portion of the accumulations of Spiritualists could not be devoted to a better use than to the promotion of the cause that lies close to the heart of every true Spiritualist. "We not only need a hall of our own," he said, "but he hoped the time would come when provision could be made for the founding of a medium's home."—Golden Gate.

CLASS O.—PSYCHOGRAPHY.

Two or three weeks ago the controls of a medium with whom I often sit, intimated their wish to try some new manifestation in slate-writing, and, if possible, to let me see the pencil in actual motion.

We had our first sitting on Friday, December 11th, with the gas turned about half down, the medium and I sitting at the corner of the table with our hands on the slate lying on the table. We got some slight, but unmistakable movements of the fragment of pencil, which on one occasion vibrated gently about its centre like a magnetic needle, as it lay on the slate. I was then directed to place the slate under the flap of the table, where I held it close to the under surface of the flap, pressing it tight with the fingers of both hands while I rested my thumbs on the upper surface of the table, so as to deprive the medium of any possible access to the surface of the slate. In this position I heard the pencil working on the slate, and when I brought up the slate I found that a bit of red chalk which was left on it had been rubbed hard over a considerable surface, without any attempt at writing.

To-day, December 14th, we had our second sitting, and made a great advance. I held the slate with only a bit of red chalk upon it close beneath the flap of the table, as before, with both my hands. The medium held it in the same way with his right hand, resting the thumb upon the table, while he placed the palm of his left hand flat down on the bare surface of the table in front of me. He soon became entranced, and the control, speaking through him, said that there were spirits there whom she did not know, who were trying to write. At the same time I heard the sound of writing, after which the control said she would bring up the bit of chalk from the slate through the wood on to the upper surface of the table. Accordingly the medium, still entranced, lifting up his left hand, which had hitherto remained without moving, flat upon the table, displayed the bit of chalk lying in the middle of the space which had been covered by his hand. It had certainly not been there when he laid his hand down on the table. I slid the slate underneath the table to my side, keeping it close to the flap so as to make any juggling with it on the part of the medium impossible, and found on bringing it up that the chalk had disappeared.

I now took the slate close to the light to see what was written, and at first I thought it was only a scrawl, but the control assured me it was the names of the spirits she had seen. She said she heard the name of Maynard, she thought; no, it was Meteyard—Eliza Meteyard. Did I know the name?

The other name, after a little boggling, she gave as Joseph Mayer. The writing was now clear enough to me; E. Met (the rest of the name being cut off by the edge of the slate), and J. M. Eliza Meteyard wrote the life of my grandfather, Josiah

Wedgwood, and Joseph Mayer was her patron at Liverpool, who supplied her with the greater part of her materials. I am confident that the medium had never heard the name of either of the two. He assures me that they are quite unknown to him, and he certainly does not move in any circle in which topics of such a nature would come under discussion. His control anticipates a brilliant career for him in the way of slate-writing. 31, Queen Anne-street, W. H. WEDGWOOD.

"Hearing Voices as an Indication of Insanity." To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—The Daily Telegraph, if incorrigible, is yet, at any rate, under influence, for it had two leading articles out of three, on Spiritualism, the same day, December 5th. And, if we do not see in it an improved tone, we are glad to find the journal rejoicing that that admirable heroine, Jeanne d'Arc, the Maid of Orleans, is likely to be soon canonised by the Church of Rome. That she has not been so before can only be because she was condemned by that Church; and the Church of Rome is, naturally, slow to reverse its own decrees. Indeed, only a liberal Pope would be likely to attempt getting over the difficulty.

St. Ouen's "Histoire de France" says: "Jeanne d'Arc was brought before a tribunal, at which several Frenchmen sat who were unworthy of that name. Spite of her sincere piety and her pure faith, she was declared a heretic, and, as such, condemned to perpetual imprisonment. Shortly afterwards the English condemned her as a relapsed heretic, and to death by burning. Charles VII. did not even make an attempt to save this woman who died for him."

The Daily Telegraph says: "It is not difficult now to see that the famous French heroine may after all have been the victim of a genuine hallucination," whatever that may be. Still, this dark saying is evidently elucidated, as far as it can be, by another observation in the same article. It says: "In all history there is nothing more astonishing than the way in which this simple shepherdess thought she heard the Divine voice telling her to be the saviour of her country."

So it is the old story. "The simple shepherdess thought she heard the Divine voice." And on August 19th, this paper told us "Half the unfortunate creatures in our madhouses fancy that they hear voices." That is what the paper calls, I suppose, "genuine hallucination"! Where is the difference between the Daily Telegraph, with all its praise of the ecstatic Maid in some respects, and Dr. Forbes Winslow in 1876, who then said, "The insanity of Joan of Arc may be considered a good example of superstitious madness"? Does he think so now? Perhaps not. There is one point, and that historical, where the Daily Telegraph is entirely wrong, if French records are right. The Daily Telegraph says: "She thought she heard the Divine voice." She never thought anything of the kind, if records are true. No, her experience entirely coincided with what Spiritualists and others of the present day frequently affirm of themselves. She said she heard "the voice of an angel." Here is an account of this wondrous maiden's own narrative, given us by the celebrated physiologist, the late Mr. J. W. Jackson, in his "Ecstasies of Genius," from MSS. existing in the Royal Library at Paris: "In my thirteenth year I heard a voice in my father's garden, at Domremy; I heard it from the right side, near the church, and it was accompanied by great brightness (odic light). At first I was afraid of it, but I soon became aware that it was the voice of an angel, who has ever since watched well over me, and taught me to conduct myself with propriety, and to attend church. Five years afterwards, while I was keeping my father's flocks, this voice said to me: 'God has great compassion for the French nation, and that I ought to get ready and go to its rescue.' When I began to weep at this the voice said to me, 'Go to Vaucouleurs and you will find a captain there who will conduct you without hindrance to the king.' Since that time I have acted according to the revelations I have received and the apparitions I have seen, and even on my trial I speak only according to that which is revealed to me." So much for the Daily Telegraph's "genuine hallucination"! We admit that the Maid of Orleans was a favoured individual, like Socrates, and that in a general way voices are not always to be depended upon.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 26TH, 1885.

UNITY IS STRENGTH.

It was not without a sense of fitness that the two subjects of Confederation and Research were treated together in the address of the President of the London Spiritualist Alliance. The plan then propounded, if successfully carried out, will have the effect of consolidating the various scattered societies throughout the kingdom, and of binding them together by a sufficient tie in the pursuit of that research with which the Experimental Section of the Alliance is concerned. This is an almost essential preliminary to the wider scheme of Confederation between Spiritualists of all lands of which the President spoke.

It has always seemed to us that Spiritualists waste force and lose power by neglect of attention to ordinary and established principles of action. What is found to be practically good, useful, or necessary in average daily life as a principle of action is, at least presumably, of equal application to ourselves. It is universally agreed that union gives strength, and that disunion is a source of dangerous weakness. Selfishness and self-seeking are vices that work evil; self-sacrifice is a virtue that brings its own reward. This is the verdict of experience.

Now let us see how we Spiritualists stand in these respects. There are, scattered up and down throughout the British Isles, a number of societies of Spiritualists who are engaged in similar pursuits, and who have the same end in view. Yet they do not keep touch of one another; they do not take counsel together; they do not seek comfort and consolation by the exchange of experience; nor do they add to the common store of knowledge by giving to the public a careful record of facts such as that record of a materialisation séance which Mr. Barkas lately contributed to our columns. They remain a disunited bundle of sticks, when they might gain power as a closely compacted faggot. Each society stands alone when it might stand shoulder to shoulder with sympathetic friends. Isolation in place of consolidation; individual in place of united effort.

Now, this is obviously neither wise nor well. The question is, can it be overcome? We believe it can; and we believe that the successful carrying out of the plan on which we are now commenting will go far to overcome this source of weakness. We have little doubt that those who are charged with the duty of working the plan will seek for co-operation from expert Spiritualists in such centres as Liverpool, Newcastle, and the various districts in which Spiritualism has struck so firm a root. They will seek to be represented in these districts by some trusted representative who will stand in regard to Spiritualists and inquirers in his district as guide, philosopher, and friend; and who will be to the Central Committee of Control a channel of information with regard to the events occurring in his own district.

By this means a blow will be immediately struck at isolation. Circles will be placed in communication with one another, and with the local society, and through it with the Alliance. The bond of union will be at once provided. Important as is the work which will be accomplished in the Metropolis by various circles devoted to research, we confess that we regard this sphere of action as one of even higher promise if it be judiciously occupied. We are ourselves so far concerned in the success of this endeavour that we make no apology for pressing upon the President and those who act with him the desirability of organising some such scheme of associated work as we have indicated without delay. It is said of us sometimes that "LIGHT" does not interest itself in country societies. Nothing could well be more remote from the real truth. We are desirous of establishing and maintaining cordial relations with all Spiritualists wherever we can find them. We would gladly receive from them such records as that of Mr. Barkas, to which we have referred. If we had time we would most cheerfully visit them, and add to the tie of a common interest that of personal acquaintance. But time and money are scarce with us, and we have not been able yet to find the necessary supply of either. We are not without hope, however, that the working of the plan of which we are now writing may provide an opportunity for the sending of some chosen representative of the Metropolitan Alliance to gather facts as to provincial Spiritualism and to make the personal acquaintance of its leaders. If this can be done, no one will welcome the step more warmly than ourselves. There are difficulties, but none insuperable. The chief one is lack of money; the old, miserable, demoralising difficulty with which we have had all along to struggle. If the democracy of Spiritualism would bear its equal burden the weight of it would be very light. If they will not translate their faith into works, then it remains to be hoped that the aristocracy of Spiritualism, which has ample means at command, will be generous enough to bear on its own shoulders a burden that should rest on all. A few donations of £100, such as Mr. Regan offered towards one special object, would enable the Alliance to organise a comprehensive plan of work, and to carry it out under its own personal direction, which would soon place Spiritualism on a very different basis, and would be to this journal of the most direct advantage.

The Council of the London Spiritualist Alliance, as the representative of the great body of Spiritualists enrolled among its members, should have in its own hands the management of research, confederation, and publication both of its journal and of the books which may be issued from time to time. Here again union would be strength, and success would be far greater than when, as now, the various agencies are in different hands.

Let us consolidate all round; let us throw selfishness in all its forms to the winds, and act in the coming year with united zeal and energy. Let those who can provide funds; let those who have no money do some honest work for the cause; and let all remember that union is strength.

We are informed that Mr. Henry Slade will be in Germany during the coming month. Through the action of antiquated laws and the bigotry of a small section of the scientific world, he will not be able to visit this country.

A new magazine devoted to Spiritualism and the occult sciences, will be published early in January next, in Munich. It will treat the subject both from the historical and the experimental point of view, and will be published monthly, being occasionally illustrated.

CASE OF CROSS MESMERISM.

Written in 1858, by A. M. H.

FROM THE UNPUBLISHED PAPERS OF MRS. HOWITT WATTS.

Our friend, Mrs. H—t, has a confidential servant (a housekeeper) who has lived with her for some years, and who, having been present at a lecture on mesmerism some time since, developed into a "sensitive." She has for many years been a "dreamer of dreams" and is open to spiritual and mesmeric influences in an extraordinary degree. It is feared that she is in a consumptive state, her health having become very feeble. A clergyman, a mutual friend of Mrs. H—t and ourselves, the Rev. J. W., has regularly mesmerised her once or twice a-week for some time past, in order to benefit her health, he being possessed of considerable mesmeric power, and experience in mesmerising also. Mr. W. had frequently expressed a wish that we (my mother and myself) might see this housekeeper of Mrs. H—t's whom I will call Black—in the mesmeric trance.

Being myself extremely sensitive to mesmeric influence, and "mediumistic," my spiritual guides have always strictly prohibited me from being present on any such occasion. Indeed, I had been told that on no account was I even to enter the house of our friend or come into personal or sympathetic contact with Black. When, on occasion, I have stopped at the door of Mrs. H—t to exchange a few words with her, to my surprise I have felt a strange mental oppression fall upon me, and my breathing suddenly become laboured.

On Sunday afternoon, November 1st, 1857 (All Souls' Day), Mr. W. called on us on his way to Mrs. H—t's, to mesmerise Black. He said would I do a kind act. Would I be so good as to accompany him to Mrs. H—t's! He was afraid that Mrs. H—t was from home, and he did not like to mesmerise poor Black unless in the presence of some lady, and her state was such that he did not like her to go without her helpful mesmeric sleep.

Remembering the strong injunctions given to me by my spiritual guides never to go to see Black or to pay visits at the house of Mrs. H—t, I hesitated. On second thoughts, however, it appeared to me to be a very unkind—not to say unchristian—act thus to prevent the poor sufferer from receiving her mesmeric strengthening through fear for myself. I, therefore, said I would accompany Mr. W., inwardly trusting, however, that we might find Mrs. H—t at home, when I should have excused myself from going into the room to Black. We had afternoon tea and then went to the house.

Mrs. H—t was from home. Black, looking ill, was anxiously awaiting her mesmeriser, and, after a few mesmeric "passes" made over her, sank into a deep trance. I sat in the room at some distance. Disagreeable sensations had seized me immediately I came inside the hall door.

Mr. W. made some inquiries from Black in her trance state regarding her health. She then beheld a vision of great darkness, clouds in chaotic confusion struggling against a bright light beheld in the heavens. She appeared much distressed in mind. Mr. W. expressed a wish that I would speak a few consoling words to her. To this I had a strong repugnance. Nevertheless, I did not express this feeling. In order to be able to speak with her I had to be brought into mesmeric rapport with her. Mr. W. asked me to take Black's hand in mine, and he made mesmeric passes over our hands. Black's hand was now grasped round mine firmly locked round it. I talked to her soothingly regarding her health. Black soon said that I must go home—I was not well, she saw—and that I was so very cold! (Indeed, it was so!) She also said that she herself was now surrounded by a bright pink-coloured cloud, mixed with sparkles of gold. Alas! I knew that this pink cloud was my spiritual atmosphere,—my protecting sphere,—which she had drawn away from me!

I was extremely anxious now that Black should be roused out of her trance and be fully demesmerised. Mr. W., however, requested me to remain quiet a little while longer, as he did not like so soon to wake her up. He made her, by a reversed pass or two, relax my hand, and I retired to the window, where I sat looking out into the garden, feeling much depressed mentally, and very cold and wretched physically. Of these sensations, of course, I said nothing. But Black was fully conscious of them; she said: "The lady had much better go home—she is very unwell—she is ill! she is very cold!" Mr. W. then awoke Black, and walked home with me.

This act of disobedience to my spiritual guardians cost me very dear, although I had sought to act, as I believed, in obedience to an injunction from a yet Higher Source, namely, to "love my neighbour as myself."

Black at that time was not alone in a very morbid state of physical health, but had on the day we paid our unlucky visit, passed through a terrible mental excitement regarding something painful connected with her own family; this, at the time, of course, being entirely unknown to Mr. W. Black's morbid condition, to a degree, had been conveyed by the mesmeric rapport established between us, over to me. The loss of my protecting cloud of encircling aura—"the pink cloud"—had weakened my power of resistance.

That night and more or less during the space of the ensuing three weeks, I felt at times overwhelmed with a vague—and apparently utterly causeless—sense of undefined misery; cold shudders would seize upon me, and at times I was like one in an ague-fit.

At night—or during the day if I closed my eyes, the spiritual sight was always open, but into the realm of pain and suffering, and I could not banish from my eyes objects of distress, crowns of thorns dropping with blood, and other pictures of anguish. Also there involuntarily presented themselves before my vision all manner of loathsome skin or internal diseases. My spiritual being wept incessantly, as it were, in the Garden of Gethsemane. Many animals appeared to pass across the field of internal vision, in troops and herds if alive, if dead presented as if sacrificed, slain and bloody. Thus especially were presented rabbits and doves. It would be impossible to note one-tenth of the objects thus beheld. Only those who have passed through similar experiences can comprehend the distress or the unavailing desire felt to escape from these visions. To close the eye to natural objects of the external world was only to open, so to speak, the internal eye.

Gradually, however, the inner sight began to present objects of a less painful nature. Gradually order supervened in the character of these visions and the meaning of them as symbols of mental states and conditions made evident to me. . . . It was, however, fully six months before the baleful influence of this morbidly conditioned invalid passed away from me, this being alone brought about by earnest prayer for spiritual help and strengthening and by every possible endeavour to preserve healthful physical and mental conditions in myself. It is singular to observe that during the course of fifteen months any person coming from the house of Mrs. H—t to ours would cause a return of the dreadful influence to myself. The aguish feeling would seize me, dread and horror of mind, a vague sense of approaching evil, and even at times I found myself walking with the languid step and sunk-in chest of a consumptive patient—altogether a physical languor entirely foreign to myself.

It was some time before we discovered that communication between the two houses brought recurrence of these symptoms. But so it was clearly.

The presence of Mr. W., whom we occasionally saw either at our own house or at the houses of friends, would also bring the same miserable sensations, though in lesser degree. Once at the house of a friend, where Mr. W. seated himself beside me for a chat at afternoon tea, I felt so utterly wretched and cold that I mentioned it to him, saying I felt as wretched as when he mesmerised Black; and he then said that he could well believe this since he had been so long in the habit of mesmerising Black, and had also himself been suffering from the same cause.

It is said that Commodore Vanderbilt's daughter, Mrs. Le Bau, inspired by the example of the donor of the Spiritual Temple, in Boston, thinks of building one in New York.

MR. W. EGLINTON leaves London early in January for St. Petersburg and Moscow, where he may stay for one or two months. On his return he will probably visit Berlin, Hamburg, Munich, and Vienna.

"THE GHOSTLY NUMBER" of Once a Week has just made its appearance, and is full of excellently-written ghost stories, many of which are the actual personal experiences of the editor, Florence Marryat.

THE President of the London Spiritualist Alliance begs to inform correspondents who may write to him respecting the Experimental Research Section of the Alliance that he will attend to all letters on his return to town after the Christmas vacation with as little delay as possible.

A NEW addition to the literature of Spiritualism in America is announced, the title being "Human Imponderables. A Psychological Study." The book is written by Mr. J. D. Featherstonhaugh, and chiefly relates to experiments with Mrs. Maud Lord, an excellent medium for physical manifestations.

A NEW STUDY of BÖHME has recently been published under the title of "Jacob Böhme: His Life and Teachings, or Studies in Theosophy." The visions seen by this remarkable man apparently suffice for the Theosophists to claim him as a brother, but why should they not have been the results of clairvoyant mediumship?

AT the next conversazione of the London Spiritualist Alliance a series of chalk drawings by Mr. J. G. Keulemans, representing various stages of the phenomena of materialisation, will be exhibited by Mr. John S. Farmer, together with other drawings of a kindred character in his possession. If any of our friends have pictures of a similar scope, which they can place at the disposal of the President of the London Spiritualist Alliance for that occasion, we shall be glad if they will communicate with us at the earliest opportunity, so that they may be catalogued for the occasion.

"SHALL I SAY YES?"—This is the somewhat curious title of a novelette written to illustrate the benefits accruing from spirit communion. The plot is a good one, but some of the conversation is rather weakly written. Notwithstanding this defect the story has a considerable interest, and we confess to not leaving it until we had finished its perusal. Spiritual phenomena are very naturally woven into the narrative, the incident of the interview between the heroine and her dead lover being exceedingly well written. "Faithful in death as in life," may be taken as the key-note of the story.

MEDIUMSHIP.—Mediumship, elevated and true, is a noble office. It is an open channel between a higher and clearer life and our own dim and struggling mortality. It should ever be used as a sacred office and a solemn responsibility. A glorious work may thus be done in the world's redemption and growth. May God and the good angels help all our mediums! May they be wisely taught the laws of self-protection and self-help. May all exposed and demoralised ones be lifted out of their unhappy surroundings and be taught to work only for the good and true. May all the channels become pure, that living waters may flow freely to the thirsty ones of earth!—Religio-Philosophical Journal.

RESTITUTION THROUGH A SPIRIT.—At the beginning of the civil war, two young men of Milan, Ohio, being about to join the army, called upon a young lady friend to say farewell. While talking, one asked for a glass of water. She left the room and procured it. After they left she missed a bracelet. One of the young men fell in the war. The young lady married. Long after the incident of the bracelet, which had faded from her mind, she awoke one night to see before her the young friend who fell in the war. "I have come," he seemed to say, "to speak about the bracelet. It was I who took it. I have always regretted it. My sister has it. I handed it to her at once when I went home. If you ask her for it, at my request, she will restore it." He disappeared. Next day she went to the sister, told her the story, and she gladly handed it to her. —The Daily Local, Sandusky, Ohio.

WHAT IS SAID OF PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

J. H. FICHTE, THE GERMAN PHILOSOPHER AND AUTHOR.—"Notwithstanding my age (83) and my exemption from the controversies of the day, I feel it my duty to bear testimony to the great fact of Spiritualism. No one should keep silent."

PROFESSOR DE MORGAN, PRESIDENT OF THE MATHEMATICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.—"I am perfectly convinced that I have both seen and heard, in a manner which should make unbelief impossible, things called spiritual, which cannot be taken by a rational being to be capable of explanation by imposture, coincidence, or mistake. So far I feel the ground firm under me."

DR. ROBERT CHAMBERS.—"I have for many years known that these phenomena are real, as distinguished from impostures; and it is not of yesterday that I concluded they were calculated to explain much that has been doubtful in the past; and, when fully accepted, revolutionise the whole frame of human opinion on many important matters."—Extract from a Letter to A. Russell Wallace.

PROFESSOR HARE, EMBERTUS PROFESSOR OF CHEMISTRY IN THE UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA.—"Far from abating my confidence in the inferences respecting the agencies of departed spirits of deceased mortals, in the manifestations of which I have given an account in my work, I have, within the last nine months" (this was written in 1858), "had more striking evidences of that agency than those given in the work in question."

PROFESSOR CHALLIS, THE LATE PLUMERIAN PROFESSOR OF ASTRONOMY AT CAMBRIDGE.—"I have been unable to resist the large amount of testimony to such facts, which has come from many independent sources, and from a vast number of witnesses. . . . In short, the testimony has been so abundant and conscientious, that either the facts must be admitted to be such as are reported, or the possibility of certifying facts by human testimony must be given up."—Clerical Journal, June, 1862.

PROFESSOR GREGORY, F.R.S.E.—"The essential question is this, What are the proofs of the agency of departed spirits? Although I cannot say that I yet feel the sure and firm conviction on this point which I feel on some others, I am bound to say that the higher phenomena, recorded by so many truthful and honourable men, appear to me to render the spiritual hypothesis almost certain. . . . I believe that if I could myself see the higher phenomena alluded to I should be satisfied, as are all those who have had the best means of judging of the truth of the spiritual theory."

LORD BROUGHAM.—"There is but one question I would ask the author, Is the Spiritualism of this work foreign to our materialistic, manufacturing age? No; for amidst the varieties of mind which divers circumstances produce are found those who cultivate man's highest faculties; to these the author addresses himself. But even in the most cloudless skies of scepticism I see a rain-cloud, if it be no bigger than a man's hand; it is modern Spiritualism."—Preface by Lord Brougham to "The Book of Nature." By C. O. Groom Napier, F.R.S.

THE LONDON DIALECTICAL COMMITTEE reported: "1. That sounds of a very varied character, apparently proceeding from articles of furniture, the floor and walls of the room—the vibrations accompanying which sounds are often distinctly perceptible to the touch—occur, without being produced by muscular action or mechanical contrivance. 2. That movements of heavy bodies take place without mechanical contrivance of any kind, or adequate exertion of muscular force by those present, and frequently without contact or connection with any person. 3. That these sounds and movements often occur at the time and in the manner asked for by persons present, and, by means of a simple code of signals answer questions and spell out coherent communications."

PROFESSOR BARRETT, F.R.S.E.—"I know and rejoice in the blessing Spiritualism has been to my own faith, and to that of several dear friends of mine. Moreover, I cordially recognise the fact that in bereavement and deep distress numbers have been cheered and consoled by the hope that Spiritualism has set before them. . . . So far from Materialism being true, I do not believe a single person has ever yet lived on this earth who has truly and heartily desired to know if an intelligent and personal existence be possible without our present bodily organism, and has steadily set himself to solve this supreme question with all the help he can gain from every source.—I say I do not believe any such earnest seeker after truth has ever failed to obtain a clear and definite answer in the affirmative."

CANILLE FLAMMARION, THE FRENCH ASTRONOMER, AND MEMBER OF THE ACADEMIE FRANCAISE.—"I do not hesitate to affirm my conviction, based on personal examination of the subject, that any scientific man who declares the phenomena denominated 'magnetic,' 'somnambulic,' 'mediumic,' and others not yet explained by science to be 'impossible,' is one who speaks without knowing what he is talking about; and also any man accustomed, by his professional avocations, to scientific observation—provided that his mind be not biased by pre-conceived opinions, nor his mental vision blinded by that opposite kind of illusion, unhappily too common in the learned world, which consists in imagining that the laws of Nature are already known to us, and that everything which appears to overstep the limit of our present formulas is impossible—may acquire a radical and absolute certainty of the reality of the facts alluded to."

CHOMWELL F. VARLEY, F.R.S.—"Twenty-five years ago I was a hard-headed unbeliever. . . . Spiritual phenomena, however, suddenly and quite unexpectedly, were soon after developed in my own family. . . . This led me to inquire and to try numerous experiments in such a way as to preclude, as much as circumstances would permit, the possibility of trickery and self-deception. . . . He then details various phases of the phenomena which had come within the range of his personal experience, and continues: "Other and numerous phenomena have occurred, proving the existence (a) of forces unknown to science; (b) the power of instantly reading my thoughts; (c) the presence of some intelligence or intelligences controlling those powers. . . . That the phenomena occur there is overwhelming evidence, and it is too late now to deny their existence."

ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, F.R.S.—"My position, therefore, is that the phenomena of Spiritualism in their entirety do not require further confirmation. They are proved, quite as well as any facts are proved in other sciences, and it is not denial or quibbling that can disprove any of them, but only fresh facts and accurate deductions from those facts. When the opponents of Spiritualism can give a record of their researches approaching in duration and completeness to those of its advocates; and when they can discover and show in detail, either how the phenomena are produced or how the many sane and able men here referred to have been deluded into a coincident belief that they have witnessed them; and when they can prove the correctness of their beliefs by producing a like belief in a body of equally sane and able unbelievers—then, and not till then, will it be necessary for Spiritualists to produce fresh confirmation of facts which are, and always have been, sufficiently real and indisputable to satisfy any honest and persevering inquirer."—Miracles and Modern Spiritualism.

DR. LOCKHART ROBERTSON.—"The writer" (i.e., Dr. L. Robertson) "can now no more doubt the physical manifestations of so-called Spiritualism than he would any other fact, as, for example, the fall of the apple to the ground, of which his senses informed him. As stated above, there was no place or chance of any legerdemain, or fraud, in these physical manifestations. He is aware, even from recent experience, of the impossibility of convincing anyone, by a mere narrative of events apparently so out of harmony with all our knowledge of the laws which govern the physical world, and he places these facts on record rather as an act of justice due to those whose similar statements he had elsewhere doubted and denied, than with either the desire or hope of convincing others. Yet he cannot doubt the ultimate recognition of facts of the truth of which he is so thoroughly convinced. Admit these physical manifestations, and a strange and wide world of research is opened to our inquiry. This field is new to the materialist mind of the last two centuries, which even in the writings of divines of the English Church, doubts and denies all spiritual manifestations and agencies, be they good or evil."—From a letter by Dr. Lockhart Robertson, published in the Dialectical Society's Report on Spiritualism, p. 24.

NASSAU WILLIAM SENIOR.—"No one can doubt that phenomena like these (Phrenology, Homoeopathy, and Mesmerism) deserve to be observed, recorded, and arranged; and whether we call by the name of mesmerism, or by any other name, the science which proposes to do this, is a mere question of nomenclature. Among those who profess this science there may be careless observers, prejudiced recorders, and rash systematisers; their errors and defects may impede the progress of knowledge, but they will not stop it. And we have no doubt that, before the end of this century, the wonders which perplex almost equally those who accept and those who reject modern mesmerism will be distributed into defined classes, and found subject to ascertained laws—in other words, will become the subjects of a science." These views will prepare us for the following statement, made in the Spiritual Magazine, 1864, p. 336: "We have only to add, as a further tribute to the attainments and honours of Mr. Senior, that he was by long inquiry and experience a firm believer in spiritual power and manifestations. Mr. Home was his frequent guest, and Mr. Senior made no secret of his belief among his friends. He it was who recommended the publication of Mr. Home's recent work by Messrs. Longmans, and he authorised the publication, under initials, of one of the striking incidents there given, which happened to a near and dear member of his family."

WHAT CONJURERS SAY ABOUT PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

Mediums, who are the instruments of an external agency, have, more than once, been confronted with conjurers who deceive by sleight of hand; and in the same manner that no man of science who has thoroughly and fairly investigated the phenomena has failed to become convinced of their reality, so no conjurer who has been confronted with the same facts has been able to explain their occurrence by prestidigitation. Houdin, Jacobs, Bellachini, Hermann, Kellar, and others have already confessed their powerlessness to produce under the same conditions what occurs without human intervention in the presence of a medium.

Testimony of Robert Houdin.

The Marquis Endes de Mirville published during the lifetime of Houdin two letters from the latter, in his "Mémoire adressé à MM. les membres de l'Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques, sur un grand nombre de phénomènes merveilleux intéressant également la Religion, la Science, et les hommes du Monde," in which the conjurer confesses his inability to explain the phenomena he witnessed in the presence of Alexis, the clairvoyant. A circumstantial account is given of M. de Mirville's visit to Houdin for the purpose of engaging him in this investigation, of the latter's confidence in his own ability to detect the trick, and of what took place at the séance, the conditions of which were entirely under Houdin's control. This account extends over twelve pages, and its accuracy is confirmed by Houdin in the first of the documents now translated:—

"Although very far from accepting the eulogies which M. — is good enough to bestow upon me, and especially insisting that I am not at all committed to opinions, either in favour of magnetism or against it, I can, nevertheless, not refrain from declaring that the facts above reported are entirely correct (sont de la plus complète exactitude), and that, the more I reflect upon them, the more impossible I find it to rank them among those which belong to my art and profession.

"4th May, 1847.

ROBERT HOUDIN."

A fortnight later, M. de Mirville received another letter, in which the following, referring to another séance, occurs:—

"I have, therefore, returned from this séance as astonished as it is possible to be, and persuaded that it is utterly impossible that chance or skill could ever produce effects so wonderful (tout à fait impossible que le hasard ou l'adresse puisse jamais produire des effets aussi merveilleux).— I am, monsieur, &c.,

"May 16th, 1847.

(Signed) ROBERT HOUDIN."

Testimony of Harry Kellar.

Harry Kellar, a distinguished professor of legerdemain, investigated the slate-writing phenomena which occurred in the presence of Mr. Eglinton, at Calcutta, in January, 1882, and on the 25th of that month he addressed a letter to the editor of the Indian Daily News, in which he said:—

"In your issue of the 13th January I stated that I should be glad of an opportunity of participating in a séance with a view of giving an unbiased opinion as to whether, in my capacity of a professional prestidigitator, I could give a natural explanation of effects said to be produced by spiritual aid.

"I am indebted to the courtesy of Mr. Eglinton, the Spiritualistic medium now in Calcutta, and of his host, Mr. J. Meugens, for affording me the opportunity I craved.

"It is needless to say I went as a sceptic, but I must own that I have come away utterly unable to explain, by any natural means, the phenomena that I witnessed on Tuesday evening. I will give a brief description of what took place."

After describing several successful experiments, Mr. Kellar proceeds:—

"In respect to the above manifestations, I can only say that I do not expect my account of them to gain general credence. Forty-eight hours before I should not have believed anyone who described such manifestations under similar circumstances. I still remain a sceptic as regards Spiritualism, but I repeat my inability to explain or account for what must have been an intelligent force that produced the writing on the slate, which, if my senses are to be relied on, was in no way the result of trickery or sleight of hand."

On the 30th of the same month Mr. Kellar addressed another letter to the Indian Daily News, reporting some experiences of another kind with Mr. Eglinton, and regarding which he said:—

"In conclusion, let me state that after a most stringent trial and strict scrutiny of these wonderful experiences I can arrive at no other conclusion than that there was no trace of trickery in any form; nor was there in the room any mechanism or machinery by which could be produced the phenomena which had taken place. The ordinary mode by which Maskelyne and other conjurers imitate levitation or the floating test could not possibly be done in the room in which we were assembled."

The Testimony of Professor Jacobs.

Professor Jacobs, writing to the editor of Licht, mehr Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—

"Spite of the assertions, more or less trustworthy, of the French and English journalists, and spite of the foolish jealousies of ignorant conjurers, I feel it my duty to show up the bad faith of one party and the chicanery of the other. All that has been said or done adverse to these American mediums is absolutely untrustworthy. If we would rightly judge of a thing we must understand it, and neither the journalists nor the conjurers possessed the most elementary knowledge of the science that governs these phenomena. As a prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the medianimic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect.

"Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. If (as I have every reason to hope) the psychical studies, to which I am applying myself at this time, succeed, I shall be able to establish clearly, and that by public demonstration, the immense line of demarcation which separates mediumistic phenomena from conjuring proper, and then equivocation will be no longer possible, and persons will have to yield to evidence, or deny through predetermination to deny."

"Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also the individuality of the spirit in 'spiritual manifestation.' I authorise you, dear sir, to insert this letter in your next number, if agreeable to you," &c., &c.

estimony of Samuel Bellachini.

"I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Berne; Butlerof, in St. Petersburg, to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the 'How' of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a notary and witnesses.

"Berlin, December 6th, 1877.

(Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI."

ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By "M.A. (Oxon)."

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct séances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experiences in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two, of negative, passive temperament, and preferably of the female sex, the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each sitter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Scepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitter spirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear. Patience is essential, and it may be necessary to meet ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such a trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful séance.

The first indications of success usually are a cold breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twitchings of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not aiding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over, but not in contact with, it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if the attempt to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might disconcert an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will check noisy manifestations.

Lastly. Try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your reason. Do not enter into a very solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well-grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.
